Mr. McFADDEN. Plus the subscription by the Government. The gentleman will remember that when the system was organized the Government subscribed some nine millions of capital, and there was a provision in the law providing for the gradual retirement of that capital as the system was put into full operation, so that now the Government's assistance in that respect is about $6,000,000, or, in other words, the Government is a stockholder in this system now to this extent.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is what I wanted to ask—where the other part of the twenty-four million and odd dollars came from.

Mr. McFADDEN. Approximately $18,000,000 from the farmer borrowers, or 5 per cent of the total of their loans, and $6,000,000 from the Public Treasury.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The total loans being about $350,000,000 up to date.

Mr. McFADDEN. Something like that.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield for another question? If the capital stock of Federal farm loan bank is equal to $50,000,000, then the amount of money that bank has to loan will amount to $1,000,000,000 or 20 times the $50,000,000?

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND].

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not propose to discuss the details of this bill, because that will be ably taken care of by the distinguished chairman of the committee and the able and influential ranking minority member on the committee and other members.

The pending bill will make available for the necessities of the farmers of this country only $25,000,000, when at present there are applications for loans pending aggregating $140,000,000. In the light of such a makeshift as this bill, I think it not inadvisable to give a brief statement of the transactions of the Federal farm loan system since its organization. The Federal Farm Loan Board act was approved by President Wilson on July 17, 1916. At that time the Democratic Party, as everybody knows, had control of every branch of the Government. This legislation is, therefore, a Democratic measure. Whatever good it has accomplished in the past the Democratic Party is entitled to credit for. If any evil has been wrought by the enactment of the law, the Democratic Party is responsible for it. Under the operations of this legislation there were 12 districts established in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting statements showing the detailed operations of the system since its organization.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRAND. This list embraces the information thus referred to from the organization of the system to December 31, 1920. It shows during this time there were 4,139 associations chartered, 131,395 loans made, the average amount of each loan being $2,810, and the total amount loaned was $369,242,464. Loans closed from the organization of the system to May 31, 1921, were 132,525, and the amount of money loaned from its organization to May 31, 1921, was $373,258,390.

In considering these figures it must be borne in mind that the loaning of money was suspended about 14 months on account of the case which was brought against the system wherein an attack was made upon the constitutionality of the act creating the Federal Farm Loan Board.

In the third district, which embraces the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, less than $20,000,000 were loaned from its organization to May 31, 1921, Georgia, my State, having borrowed only $4,611,985. It will be seen by a study of these figures that outside of districts No. 1 and No. 2, the district in which Georgia is situated has borrowed less money than any other district in the United States.

I also desire to extend my remarks by a statement showing the allotment to the various banks of the $40,000,000 bond issue which was placed before the investing public on April 15. This statement shows that the Columbia Bank, which is the bank having control of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, was allotted $2,400,000. With the exception of the first, second, and eleventh districts, the third district received less money than any other district in the United States. The eleventh and second districts were allotted $2,350,000 each, while the first district was only allotted $1,650,000.

According to the calculations furnished me by the Federal Farm Loan Board, with this small amount allotted to the third district, if equally distributed each association will receive about $6,500 of this $40,000,000 bond issue; and yet, in my district alone—the eighth district of Georgia, in which an association has been formed in every one of the 13 counties with one exception—the applications for loans amount to between $600,000 and $700,000. It will thus be seen that practically no benefit will be derived by the farmers of the third district from this bond sale. The amount allotted is utterly and hopelessly inadequate to take care of the needs of the farmers of my district, which is a severe disappointment to me.

This is more or less true of all the other districts in the United States. This is the situation which confronts the farmers of the United States at the present time.

A simple statement of these figures demonstrates beyond all question the utter inability of the money made available by this bill to supply the farmers' requirements and the absolute necessity for the speedy enactment of legislation making available more money than this bill provides for. If this Congress has any interest in the farmers of this country, and if the Federal Farm Loan Board is expected to function and do business as contemplated by the Congress which originally enacted this legislation, something more must be done than the passage of this bill. Notwithstanding the enormous amount of money which the farmers of the country are needing, all the party in power is willing to do for them is to authorize the Treasury to allow the Federal Farm Loan Board to use about $25,000,000 to take care of applications for loans amounting to $140,000,000.

Somebody is responsible for neglect of duty in this regard, and as the Republicans are in complete control of every branch of the Government, and have been since March 4, the Republican Party can not escape responsibility for failure to relieve the emergency and to supply ample funds to the farmers for their use. I take no particular pleasure in charging the Republican Party for this responsibility, and yet this is the logical conclusion which the facts and figures irresistibly point to and about which there can not be any debate. Many Members of this Congress, including Democrats and Republicans, and of the preceding Congress, when the Republicans had control of the House and Senate, have time and again professed great solicitude for the farmer, and yet when they are demanding loans under a law which entitles them to make application therefor amounting to $140,000,000, provision is only made for the paltry sum of $25,000,000. As a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, I assume it is not out of place to state that we had a most difficult time to get at the hands of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House a favorable report even for this insignificant amount. The Republican Party is responsible for this, and more particularly the Banking and Currency Committees of the Senate and House.

I have great respect for every member of the Banking and Currency Committee and for its distinguished chairman. He is a perfect gentleman. Yet, as chairman of the committee, he is "as mild mannered a man as ever cut a throat or scuttled a ship." I believe all of them have a sympathetic feeling for the farmer in his distressed condition, yet so far as relieving the farmer is concerned, with the exception of action upon this bill, they have been as silent as the Pyramids.

The reason nothing more has been accomplished, in my judgment, is due to the fact that the moneyed interest of the country, the inveterate foe and enemy of the farm-loan system, has controlled this administration, though I do not charge improperly so. The moneyed and banking interests of this country and Wall Street, backed up by the policies of the Federal Reserve Board, have virtually destroyed the farmers of the South and West. I charge them with the great slump in the price of cotton, forcing it from 45 cents to 11 cents per pound, causing a great section of this Republic to lose millions and millions of dollars, whereby they are left in an impoverished and indescribable condition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This administration can provide ample and sufficient money to accommodate the wants and needs of the farmers of the United States if it wishes to do so. We might as well be plain and call a spade a spade. The banking interests was the man behind the curtain which instituted the attack upon the constitutionality of this act. They wanted to destroy it; they have been opposed to it from its inception. The moneyed interests of the North and East and of the great cities of the country were opposed to this legislation when it was first inaugurated and they have been opposed to it ever since. The people of the great cities have no sympathy for this legislation. I do not believe—outside of the Republicans from the Western States—that the Republican Party is any friend to this legislation. President Harding himself was opposed to this legislation when he was a Member of the Senate. He not only made a speech but voted against the farm loan bill.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND. I do not know that I have the time.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask if the Democratic Party and the Democratic administration have been any more favorable to this?

Mr. BRAND. Why, it is a Democratic measure. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Democrats are the father of it. Most, if not all, the money, amounting to nearly $400,000,000, which the farmers have gotten was due to the Democratic Party.

Bills of this character have received no sympathy at the hands of this Republican Congress or either of the Banking and Currency Committees of the House and the Senate. The opposition from the source to which I have referred has been intensified by want of friendship and sympathy for the farmer by the Federal Reserve Board, which, by the policies adopted by it last year, however honest the board may have been in promulgating them, has practically destroyed the farming interests from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND. I think I shall get to something you will agree to, Brother NELSON, in a minute. I do not mean to be discourteous, because I regard you as one of the best Republicans in this House.

There has never been a time in my day and generation when, as last year, officers of the Government, aided, innocently it may be, by strong and powerful moneyed interests of the country, have so successfully operated against the interests of the farmers of this country, and unless this Congress comes to his relief it will be the crime of the century, which ought not to go unpunished. This Congress and your party should let the moneyed and banking interests of this country know and understand that they can not further control their conduct as lawmakers, for unless something more than the enactment of the pending bill is put upon the statute books, judgment day will come to the party in power as sure as night follows the day.

The policy of do-nothing for the farmers of this country is indefensible. I admit it is a debatable question whether legislation can remedy the woes and sacrifices of a suffering people, but any legislative tyro knows that the combined efforts of the President, Secretary of the Treasury, and the Federal Reserve Board can accomplish anything humanly possible. It would be a humiliating confession to admit that they were thus impotent to relieve the people from the pall of distress which hangs over them. They should have the courage, as they have the intelligence, to do their full duty. They should be moved by the patriotic spirit of their great leader, Abraham Lincoln, of whom it has been said:

> Whether in his cabin in Kentucky or Indiana, whether steering a flatboat down the Mississippi River or making rails in the forests of Illinois, whether a captain in the Black Hawk War or carrying the village post office in his hat—in whatever position he was called he met every duty well.

Personally speaking, I would like to see the Republican Party strip itself of those selfish incumbrances which have attached themselves to it like the body of death and make itself equal to the emergency which confronts the people, and by appropriate action promptly relieve the farmers of the Nation of the perilous crises which overwhelm them.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND. I have not the time at the moment.

Mr. KING. Speaking of these appendages, is the gentleman referring to President Harding of the Federal reserve system?

Mr. BRAND. I will have something to say about his policies before I quit, though I do not mean to be personally offensive.

If they fail to do this, I hope and believe they will be punished for their dereliction at the first opportunity the people may have a chance to render their verdict. As an illustration of the statement which I have made in regard to the Banking and Currency Committees of Congress and the Federal reserve system, I cite you to the fact that during the last session Senator Hoke Smith, of Georgia, and myself on the same day introduced a bill in the respective Houses to make the paper and obligations of factors and warehousemen eligible for rediscount, the object of which was to help the farmers of the country to successfully handle and market their crops of wheat, corn, cotton, cattle, wool, and all other things produced by them. It was months and months before either of us could get a hearing before the Banking and Currency Committees, and while favorable reports were had, it was at a time—as the Republicans know—they could not be heard in the House and Senate, and for that reason they died when Congress adjourned. In addition to this, I introduced a bill at the last session of the Congress, being the first Member of the Congress who did so, to limit the maximum amount of interest charged by the Federal reserve banks to member banks to 5 per cent. Both of these bills died in the committee rooms. They died without a hearing and "without the benefit of clergy." [Laughter.]

On the first day of this session of Congress I introduced this same interest bill, and yet up to date no hearing has been had on it. In addition to this, I introduced a bill on April 30 providing for a loan by the Federal Reserve Board to the Federal Farm Loan Board of $50,000,000 to take care of pending applications for loans of farmers. I was the first man in either branch of Congress to introduce such a measure. This bill provided that this money should be loaned out of the $100,000,000 earned by the Federal reserve system during the last fiscal year, much of which was earned by charging usurious rates of interest, which Lord Bacon, in his work on Civil History, pronounced to be "the bastard use of money." Later on Senator CURTIS introduced a bill in the Senate with the same purport as the pending bill. Mr. NELSON introduced the same bill in the House. It was a difficult matter for Mr. NELSON, who was a Republican, to get a hearing on his bill, and I have never been able to have a roll call on mine, much less a hearing. It is sleeping in the office of the distinguished chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and unless the great banking interests of the North and East and the Federal Reserve Board take their iron clutches from the throat of the Banking and Currency Committee it will be the sleep of death. Mr. UPSHAW, of Georgia, introduced a bill providing that the Government should loan direct to the farmers $200,000,000. This bill has never been heard of since. The last time I heard of it was the first time it was mentioned in the committee, and then it had the death rattle in its throat. Later on my good friend Judge CRISP, of Georgia, introduced a bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to loan to the Federal Farm Loan Board the sum of $200,000,000 to be used by this board in making loans to farmers under the Federal farm loan act.

Subsequently my personal friend, GORDON LEE, also introduced a bill directing the Treasury to loan the farmers $200,000,000. Notwithstanding the earnest desire of my colleagues to get a hearing on these bills, if either one of them has ever had a speaking acquaintance with any member of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House I do not know it, and the mark of death rests upon their faces. And I also introduced a bill amending the Federal reserve act by making the Secretary of Agriculture an ex officio member of the Federal Reserve Board. The purpose of this was to provide a friend in this court for the farmer. This board is now composed of two college professors, three bankers, one lawyer, and one newspaper man, and no member of it is a representative of the farmer or the agricultural interests of the country. I also introduced a bill providing for the transfer from time to time of the profits earned by the Federal reserve banks to the Federal Farm Loan Board for the purpose of using the same to take care of applications for loans on the part of farmers as they were submitted. I have never had a hearing on either one of these bills, and they lie in cold storage.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield? Was not the failure of these bills, especially the House one, due to the objections and propaganda conducted by Mr. W. P. G. Harding, president of the Federal Reserve Board, of Birmingham, Ala.?

Mr. BRAND. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois, I think, to be frank about it, he is primarily the cause of the failure of obtaining favorable action upon all the bills that went to the Banking and Currency Committee which sought to amend the Federal reserve act. [Applause.] The truth is, without in any sense reflecting on him personally, he has more influence in the Committee on Banking and Currency than he ought to have. This was true even when Senator GLASS was chairman of the committee and subsequently when Mr. Platt became chairman. It is the same way now, and every member of the committee knows it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is he a licensed undertaker?

Mr. BRAND. I do not know, but I do know there will be many financial corpses in the South if relief does not soon come.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BRAND. I cite all these instances to demonstrate the proposition which I first laid down that nothing has been done for the farmer by the Republican Party in this Congress, and likely will not be done, except the passage of the emergency tariff bill, which, in my judgment, is a fraud upon its face. It will do the western farmer no good, though it was conceived and brought forth to help if possible, but particularly to placate the Republican voters of the West who flocked to the polls under the Harding banner. But the bill is a monstrosity, as I see it, and reminds me of "a certain" animal of the South, which is "without the pride of ancestry or the hope of posterity." [Applause.]

I do not charge anybody with corruption, and yet it is my honest conviction that the banking and moneyed interests of the North and East, backed up by the policies of the Federal Reserve Board, are responsible for this neglect of duty on the part of the Republican Party. They are exemplifying and bringing forth in full fruitage the spirit which Secretary Houston, under the Wilson administration, and a member of the Federal Reserve Board exhibited to the delegation who came to Washington in the fall of 1920, when, according to press reports, Houston told this delegation in substance "to go back home and quit complaining," and Gov. Harding, speaking for the Federal Reserve Board, told them "to go home and go to work." These were the messages given to the representatives of the farmers' organization which assembled from all over the country, coming here to plead for assistance and relief for the suffering and distressed farmers at home. This is not in keeping with the injunction of the great Galilean and the immortal doctrine first put forth 20 centuries ago on the plains of Palestine:

> As ye would that men do unto you, do ye also unto them likewise.

[Applause.]

It is rather more in keeping with the disposition of Monseigneur the Marquis, one of the great lords in power at the court, who held fortnightly receptions in his grand hotel in Paris, a character of Dickens, in his work A Tale of Two Cities, which records this incident:

"With a rattle and clatter and an inhuman abandonment of consideration not easy to be understood, the carriage dashed through the streets and swept around corners, with women screaming before it and men clutching each other and clutching children out of its way. At last, swooping at a street corner by a fountain, one of its wheels came to a sickening little jolt, and there was a loud cry from a number of voices, and the horses reared and plunged. His valet had gotten down in a hurry, and there were 20 hands at the horses' bridles.

"'What has gone wrong?' said monsieur, calmly looking out.

"'Pardon, Monsieur the Marquis,' said a ragged and submissive man, 'it is a child.'

"'Why does he make that abominable noise? Is it his child?'

"'Killed!' shrieked the man in wild desperation, extending both arms at their length above his head and staring at him. 'Dead!'

"'It is extraordinary to me' said he, 'that you people can not take care of yourselves and your children. One or the other of you is forever in the way. How do I know what injury you have done to my horses?'

"After the reception was over, his lordship returned to his room. Leaving only one light burning on the large hearth, he let his thin gauze curtains fall around him and fell asleep.

"Next morning he was found dead in his bed, with a knife driven into his heart, and around its hilt was a frill of paper on which was scrawled, 'Drive him fast to his tomb.'"

Of course, I do not mean to invite such disaster to any human being or to make this reference in any sense personal to anyone. Otherwise the excerpt speaks for itself.

These replies to the people's demands were particularly a severe blow to the cotton growers of the South, who are as honest, hard-working, patriotic, and brave people as live under the heavens' blue dome. They sent their sons across the high seas, and in their hearts and with their prayers, like stoics and philosophers, followed the flag wherever it floated when the world was on fire with war. The President of the United States and the Republican Party, now in control of Congress, knew of the treatment, as alleged, the people received at the hands of these high officers, and it was my hope that they would take advantage of the situation and get away from their cold-bloodedness and merciless disposition and would do something speedily which would substantially and materially relieve those in the fields who from early dawn to late dusk follow the plow and bend over the hoe.

Speaking for the farmers of my State and district, I ask for them no sympathy, I appeal to you for no mercy, I only beseech you in authority to give them justice—justice, not wrong; bread and not a stone; a fish and not a serpent. This was denied them by Secretary Houston and by the Federal Reserve Board, and up to date it has been denied them by the Republican Party. All the farmer of this country asks, whether he is a western wheat and corn farmer or a southern cotton grower, is justice—and equal and exact justice—to one and all. Some one has said that justice has no distinctions, no grades, and no varieties, and this is true. Justice was, is now, and forever will be one and inseparable. The same law that wafts the leaf with the breeze swings the stars upon their courses and moves the universe to the music of its infinite harmony. [Applause.]

In Edward Bulwer-Lytton's book entitled "Rienzi, the Last of the Tribunes," and in one of Rienzi's public utterances, Lord Lytton makes him say:

> Yes; the day is at hand when Rome shall rise again from her ashes; justice shall dethrone oppression; men shall walk safe in their ancient forum. We will rouse from his forgotten tomb the indomitable soul of Cato. There shall be a people once more in Rome. And I—I shall be the instrument of that triumph, the restorer of my race; mine shall be the first voice to swell the battle cry of freedom; mine the first hand to rear her banner. Yes; from the height of my own soul as from a mountain I see already rising the liberties and the grandeur of the new Rome; and on the corner stone of the mighty fabric posterity shall read my name.

As I listened to the inaugural address of President Harding, whom I take to be a well-meaning and good man, and if allowed to have his own way will make a great President, and particularly when he gave his assurances and made his promises in behalf of all the people of the country, I thought of this eloquent prophecy of Rienzi. If the President and his party will carry into execution their public expressions in behalf of all the people, particularly the farmers of the country, this administration will ever be held in grateful remembrance.

If you Republicans fail to carry this burden and lift from the back of the farmer the load which is furrowing his brow and making him gray, a merciless retribution will be your portion and the wrath of a Nation of producers shall be your heritage.

In the meantime, and notwithstanding I have but little to base it on, it is my hope—

That the battle to the strong shall not be given
While the Judge of right and wrong sits in heaven.

[Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all those who speak on this subject may have the right to extend their remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that all those who speak upon this bill may be permitted to extend their remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I was led to introduce my bill, H. R. 6296, which was a companion bill and identical with Senate bill 1837, introduced in the Senate by Senator CURTIS, of Kansas, and passed by the Senate on June 2, 1921, because I believe that there is to-day an emergency in the agricultural regions of our country that must be relieved by legislation of this character. Senate bill 1837, as amended by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House and by it unanimously recommended for passage, is now before us for consideration.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman has given this subject great thought and has the interest of the farmers at heart. Does he understand that if this bill becomes a law the $50,000,000 will act as a revolving fund and the banks will then have capital sufficient to meet the needs of the farmers?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that it is my best judgment that it will do so. In order to make it a little clearer, will say that there is at the present time approximately $25,000,000 of paid-in capital stock in the system. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to deposit in the Federal land banks $25,000,000 in addition to the $6,000,000 already authorized under section 32 of the Federal farm loan act, making a total possible deposit of $31,000,000, which, added to the $25,000,000 of capital stock, makes a total turnover fund for purchasing farm mortgages of $56,000,000. It is my belief and the belief of the Federal Farm Loan Board that with this $56,000,000 of available funds the banks can function efficiently and uninterruptedly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. The sum total of this bill amounts to only $25,000,000. This bill does not affect the $25,000,000 capital stock or original loans. So all this bill does is to make available $25,000,000 in addition to what the board already has?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was informed at the time the Senate passed this bill that the Federal Farm Loan Board advised the Senate that they needed $50,000,000, as provided in the Senate bill. What information has the committee to offer the House that the Farm Loan Board has revised its figures since they advised the Senate that they needed $50,000,000?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. I will say this, that the Federal Farm Loan Board no doubt believes that inasmuch as we have been almost two months selling the bond issue of $40,000,000, and which is not yet quite sold, it looks as if at the present time the provision for a total available fund of $56,000,000 is quite sufficient.

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of the fact that the $40,000,000 issue recently put on the market has not been consumed by the public, is it not the fact that that is the situation that makes this legislation necessary?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. That raises the question that the United States Treasury is not being asked here to make permanent loans to the farmers, but that we are trying to facilitate the orderly functioning of the act as originally intended, namely, that by means of deposits and by means of the capital stock we shall be able to make the banks themselves function.

Mr. BARKLEY. The difficulty that occurs to me is this: If the Farm Loan Board can not now sell its farm-loan bonds and we limit the assistance of the Treasury to $25,000,000 and they can not sell their bonds, we are really not meeting the needs of agriculture by limiting the amount to $25,000,000.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. The gentleman will understand that 15 days after the bond sale is closed the banks can immediately begin again to accumulate mortgages, and as soon as they have $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 accumulated they can then go on with another sale.

Mr. BARKLEY. You mean by the term "when they are closed" the time when they are sold?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. And if they do not, by means of the $50,000,000 provided for under your plan, then the bond issue would not be closed at all until the money was available?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. The bond issue will be closed when the entire issue authorized and offered is sold and the money obtained on the bond sale.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. You mean 15 days after the sale of the bonds offered?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. After the bond sale has been closed. Fifteen days after that the deposit by the Treasury shall be returned again to the Government. The gentleman understands that this deposit must be understood to be a deposit and not a loan?

Mr. LONDON. I understand that. Does the expression "the conclusion of the offering" have a special meaning in law, or a special meaning in the world of finance?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. I take it that it is a commercial expression, and means that 15 days after the bond sale is closed the money must be redeposited with the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman think it would be preferable, instead of saying that "the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion," make the deposit, to say, "the Secretary shall deposit," making it mandatory?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. We have simply followed the language of the original act in that respect; the original act proposing a deposit of $6,000,000 contains this language.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the Secretary of the Treasury did not approve of this course, there would be no relief in the bill?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes; but I do not think that the Secretary of the Treasury would even take such an arbitrary stand. I think that part of this $6,000,000 that was provided for under the original act has been deposited several times with the Federal land banks.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. As to the last sentence in the bill—

> The aggregate of such additional deposits outstanding at any time shall not exceed the difference between the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks on the last day of the preceding month, and the sum of $50,000,000. The certificates of indebtedness issued to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Federal land bank for such additional deposits shall bear a rate of interest not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the last bond issue of the land bank receiving such deposits.

Do I understand that the land banks will have to pay the Treasury more interest than the land banks are getting on their bonds?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Why?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. The idea is that there shall be no open door for inflation in this matter, and that the Federal land banks shall only use this deposit while they are in the process of accumulating their mortgages and preparing for the sale of their bonds. In other words, we believe, and the Federal Land Bank Board believes, that we should not encourage any proposition of simply depositing the money indefinitely in the Federal land banks.

Mr. RAMSEYER. You can not get any more money from the Treasury than the difference between the capital stock and $50,000,000?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. That is all, plus the original $6,000,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then I do not see how your reasoning applies.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. There would be no object on the part of the Federal land banks to use this deposit except during the time absolutely necessary to purchase mortgages previous to a bond sale, and as soon as the bond sale is closed the money will be turned back to the Treasury.

This bill proposes to amend the first paragraph of section 32 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act. Section 32 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, upon the request of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to deposit for the temporary use of any Federal land bank out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and requires that the Federal land bank in which such deposit is made shall issue to the Secretary of the Treasury a certificate of indebtedness for the deposit to be secured by farm loan bonds or other collateral satisfactory to the Secretary. The rate of interest on such certificates of indebtedness, under the act, shall not exceed the current rate charged for other Government deposits, and the aggregate of all sums deposited with the Federal land banks at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $6,000,000.

The amendment of the bill before us proposes to modify this paragraph in three respects:

First. Provision is made for deposits in addition to the $6,000,000 authorized in the original section in such sums as the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion deem proper, not exceeding the difference between the capital of the banks and $50,000,000 up to such time as the paid-in capital of the banks shall have been increased to $50,000,000; the result being to make available for the normal operations of the banks, including their capital, a sum equal to $50,000,000 and terminating the provision when their capital reaches that sum, leaving unaffected and continuing the repository privilege of $6,000,000 carried in the original act.

Second. The certificates of indebtedness for any additional deposits authorized under this act shall bear a rate of interest not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the land bond issue of the bank receiving such deposit. The last issue of bonds by all of the banks bore interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, so that an additional deposit under the provisions of this act made at this time would bear 5½ per cent.

Third, it is made mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to call any additional deposits which may be made pursuant to this provision within 15 days after the conclusion of each general offering of farm loan bonds by any bank or banks having any such additional deposit.

It will thus be seen that the plan of this measure is that this extra deposit privilege will be continually reduced in proportion to the constantly increasing capital of the banks, which increases steadily at the rate of 5 per cent of every loan made, and that the privilege will automatically terminate when the banks have thus increased their capital to $50,000,000, and it will be further noted that as to the additional deposits authorized by this bill it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to recall any such deposits which he may have made, at the conclusion of any general bond offering by the bank holding such deposit, so that the extra deposits hereby authorized can only be made use of between bond sales and for the purpose of accumulating farm loan bonds in sufficient volume to make a general offering.

The present capital being approximately $25,000,000, this amendment makes possible, by the deposit of the Secretary of the Treasury in the Federal land banks, a total available capital of $56,000,000, being the $6,000,000 already provided for by the original section 32 of the Federal farm loan act, the present capital of $25,000,000, and the additional deposit by the Secretary of the Treasury of the difference between $50,000,000 and the present capital stock, or $25,000,000.

The necessity for the enlargement of this depository privilege, in order that the Federal land banks may continuously and uninterruptedly function, arises from a fundamental defect in the original act itself in the lack of sufficient capital for adequate turnover. The banks in normal operation will purchase mortgages daily to the extent of about $500,000, which will mean, in turn, an equal capacity for the issuance of bonds.

The experience of the system has clearly demonstrated that it is not practical to market bonds continuously and in small volume as this immediately tends to break down the market value of the bonds, but to market these bonds effectively it is necessary to accumulate a volume sufficient to make a general public offering. These offerings, experience has proven, should be in amounts from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000, depending upon the condition of the market. The provisions of this bill, as now amended, will make it possible for the Federal land banks to make offerings of this size.

It is my firm conviction that this bill should be passed by this House to-day. Its approval and passage by the Senate indicates clearly that that body believed that it was for the interest of the farmer, and, indirectly, of the general public that this bill should become law. I desire to call your attention to the fact that this bill has the approval and support of the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. A. W. Mellon, and the unqualified support and approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, farm organizations, business interests in the agricultural regions, and the country banks in our agricultural sections. President Harding, in his speech in New York on May 23, 1921, as reported by the New York Herald, stated:

> We will do well to keep in mind the fundamental importance of agriculture, and in every possible way insure justice to it; to place our agricultural industry on a sound basis and provide machinery and facilities for financing and distributing crops.

The Washington Post, under date of J[illegible] 1921, reports that trade is reviving, but states that—

> The industrial improvement has progressed much faster than the agricultural improvement and for this reason much attention must be given to relief for agricultural producers.

Mr. Otto H. Kahn, one of the eminent New York bankers and financial writers, in an address delivered before the Traffic Club, of Pittsburgh, Pa., April 28, 1921, refers to the farm problem in words that I think bear directly on the bill before us to-day, when he says:

> Adversity and hardship have come upon the farmer, as they have come or can not fail to come in a greater or lesser degree upon every element in the community in the painful economic process through which the country is passing. But that wave of trouble struck first of all the farmer; perhaps, also, it struck him hardest, and under existing conditions he is least able to protect himself and "get from under."
> From this and other causes the farmer is greatly discontented and under a sense of grievance with the existing order of things. His is a toilsome and none too well requited calling at best, involving inevitable hardships and deprivations. The vital necessity of the farming industry needs no emphasis. The immense social value of the farming class to the State is beyond argument. If there is one calling which has a higher claim than another upon the helpful consideration of the State among those which make up the sum total of the Nation's activities, it is that of the farmer. His just grievances call for immediate, intelligent consideration and for effective redress. If that redress can only be made effectively by methods which are new and somewhat unpalatable to the established ways of business, then the less important will have to yield to the more important; that is, business convenience and customs to the true welfare of the farming industry.

I am perfectly aware that a great many believe that our policy should be to keep the Government out of private business as far as possible, in which I heartily concur, and yet it is very evident that the Government must in some cases, as it did during the war and as it must in this present awful aftermath of that war, aid in critical instances where a basic industry is threatened with dire ruin, and, as has been suggested by the President, we must do our best to aid agriculture and put it on a sound basis.

I also believe that we are all agreed that, so far as our financial, industrial, and agricultural conditions are concerned, we are at the present time in the most crucial period of our Nation's history, and because of the tremendous expansion, both by the Government and by private and corporate interests during the war, we are now faced with a condition where it is absolutely necessary for us to conserve and cooperate in every way possible in all our basic industries in order that we shall be able to carry out a program of proper production and proper distribution of our products of the farm, mill, and factory.

It does seem to me that when the President of the United States; the Secretary of the Treasury, who is the highest financial authority in the Government; the Farm Loan Board, which is charged with the administration of the Federal farm loan act, farm organizations; business interests; and bankers and financial writers all combine in pleading and appealing for the relief and welfare of our farming industry, Congress can not afford to ignore the apparent distressed condition in one of the basic industries of our country. This bill should be passed and thus place the machinery of the farm loan system in a position to function in the most efficient manner possible.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Am I correct in my analysis of the bill that the aggregate stock of the farm loan banks is approximately $25,000,000?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. And am I correct that the language—

> The aggregate of such additional deposits outstanding at any time shall not exceed the difference between the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks on the last day of the preceding month and the sum of $50,000,000—means that the maximum amount that can be secured from the Treasury will be approximately $25,000,000?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Plus the $6,000,000 of the original act which is not interfered with, or a total of $31,000,000.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Am I further correct in my understanding that the bill as it comes from the Senate fairly and squarely permits that to be doubled?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. No. The bill as it came from the Senate would mean a total deposit of $50,000,000, whereas the amended bill under discussion would mean a total deposit of $31,000,000, or a difference of $19,000,000. That is, the total available fund under this bill is $19,000,000 less than the total available fund under the Senate bill.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Am I correct in saying that as it came from the Senate it permitted assistance to the extent of $50,000,000?

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Then I am correct in saying that as this works out the assistance derived from the Government is reduced about one-half.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. No; only $19,000,000, as the Senate bill only provides for a total deposit of $50,000,000 and the bill under consideration provides a total deposit of $31,000,000 by the Treasury.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If the gentleman will yield, it allows all that is asked for by the Federal Loan Board. Why deposit $50,000,000 if $25,000,000 will permit the board to function?

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. With the permission of the gentleman from Kansas, I will say that up to this time I am simply asking for information, and with all due respect to what the gentleman says the Farm Loan Board needs, that may be correct, but I have heard to the contrary.

AGRICULTURE, OUR GREATEST BASIC INDUSTRY, IN DISTRESS.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. I think we all agree that agriculture is the greatest basic industry of our Nation, and it is the foundation upon which all other industries is built. There can be no success in the manufacturing East unless there is prosperity in the agricultural West, Middle West, and South. So closely related and correlated are the conditions of our country that our entire superstructure becomes paralyzed when agriculture, the base of our industrial and commercial system, becomes discouraged and unable to function. It is my appeal, therefore, that this House pass Senate bill 1837, companion bill of my bill H. R. 6296, as amended, in order to enable the farmers to function in their respective communities. From reports in the hearings before the Senate and House Banking and Currency Committees, it is very evident that the financial stress of the farmers is such that it is absolutely necessary for both the Federal land banks and the joint-stock land banks to assist these communities with long-time credits through the legislation proposed in this bill and the Clague bill, H. R. 6035.

The agricultural interests of the Nation are looking to Congress for this assistance in this crucial hour. The Senate committee hearings of May 9 and 10, 1921, disclose the following interesting facts: The total loans of all national banks in the United States are about $14,000,000,000, and that less than $2,000,000,000 is loaned to the farmers, 21 per cent to manufacturing enterprises, and 36 per cent to merchandising business. Yet agriculture furnishes more primary deposits than both manufacturing and merchandising enterprises combined. Based upon the rules of credit, therefore, agriculture should be entitled to 57 per cent of the $14,000,000,000, or $7,980,000,000, in place of $2,000,000,000, which is now the amount loaned to the farmers by the national banks.

The amendment of the farm-loan act as proposed will bring a measure of tangible and direct relief to the direful condition in which the agriculture of the country finds itself. It would seem needless to point out that the situation with respect to agriculture is worse at this moment than at any previous time within the memory of the oldest. The processes of deflation struck agriculture first, and agricultural values were the first to shrink to the prewar level. The country banks have loaned themselves up to the limit in an effort to tide the farmer through the period of distress; their liquid paper is exhausted; they are helpless to furnish further relief and are as vitally interested in the farmer being able to come into possession of our sources of credit as is the farmer himself. Every relief offered the farmer in the way of a farm loan results in releasing for ordinary and normal banking usage funds of the bank now tied up in loans which the farmer can liquidate in no other way, thus conferring a very direct benefit upon commerce and industry in addition to the service directly rendered the farmer.

In view of the very distressed condition of agriculture, with foreclosures threatened in every section of the country, with loan agencies reaping a harvest in maximum interest rates and exorbitant commissions, in view of the large number of country banks facing dissolution unless there can be some outlet for their present long-time credits for the farmers, and in view of the necessity of making the farmers the purchasers of our manufactured products so as to keep the wheels of industry and commerce going for the benefit of the laborers in the industrial centers, it would seem to me to be the part of wisdom to pass this bill and correct a fundamental defect in the organic act of this system in not providing sufficient capital in the beginning for its proper functioning, and thus meet the emergency which to-day exists in one of the basic industries of our Nation. The important thing under the financial pressure which now exists is to enable the farm-loan system in its dual provisions to work to its maximum capacity.

The farmer has only one turnover a year. Forced liquidation under too strong pressure means his undoing and ruin. He must have time. Long-time credits must be made available. Banks in agricultural sections must be helped to carry the farmers until farm products can be raised and sold to liquidate present debts caused by the sudden and terrific readjustment and lowering of values of all farm products. Deflation in farm products has been ruinous. In a year's time corn has been reduced in price from $1.80 a bushel to 30 cents a bushel; hogs from 18 cents per pound to 6 cents per pound; eggs from 60 and 70 cents a dozen to 15 and 20 cents per dozen; butter from 65 cents per pound to 25 cents per pound; while machinery and manufactured articles that the farmer has to buy are still largely at war-time prices. With the denial of long-time credits, the farmer faces, in many sections of the cotton and grain belts, utter ruin.

The farmers have been urging and pleading for an adjustment of our freight rates, and we are happy to know that our great President, who has the interest of agriculture at heart, in the truest and noblest sense, is using the influence of his great office in trying to find a proper adjustment of our freight rates. We trust that his efforts will be crowned with success in this regard and that Congress will rise to the occasion and assist our President in every possible way.

Indeed, the farmer has faced a depreciation in his products that means his bankruptcy. Farm products and stock shipped to the markets from many agricultural States have not brought a price sufficient to pay the cost of transportation. Listen to these figures from Kansas received through the courtesy of my esteemed colleague, Mr. HOCH, of Kansas:

On a recent shipment of alfalfa from a Kansas farm to Kansas City the shipper received $10.50 a ton on the Kansas City market. The hay graded No. 1. The shipper paid $6.50 a ton freight, $1 a ton to the commission house, and had paid $3 a ton for baling, making a total of $10.50 a ton, with nothing left for producing or cutting or as return on investment. The result of this prohibitive freight rate is that thousands of tons of hay are being left to rot because it will not pay to ship, and great acreages of hay were not even cut.

The county agent of Greenwood County, Kans., reports that on a recent shipment of lumber to that county the freight was more than the value of the material.

A Coffey County, Kans., hay shipper says that hay which cost him $6.70 a ton put in the barn brings $4 a ton after freight and commissions are paid.

James R. Plumb, a prominent farmer and stockman of Lyon County sends me a memorandum showing freight paid on cattle shipments to Kansas City, a little over 100 miles. On 40-foot car the freight in 1916 was $26.40, in 1920 it was $35.61, and in 1921, $48.20. On hog shipments to same place, 36-foot car, the freight for same dates were $23.80, $30.64, and $41.15, almost double from 1916 to 1921.

In a letter to Congressman CARL W. RIDDICK, Mr. Roy J. Covert, president of the Merchants' National Bank, of Billings, Mont., says:

This year, speaking for our own sheep, I expect we will sell our wool for about 20 cents a pound and our lambs for about 6 cents a pound, may be 5 cents, and we will again meet with a loss, but I do not think we will about strike bottom this year. If there are any sheepmen left in the business, they will then begin to operate probably on a working basis, but in order to reach this basis, farm lands, overhead expenses, and foundation stock valuations will have been reduced so drastically that it will take these stockmen a generation to recover the loss.

SECRETARY MELLON'S APPROVAL.

Secretary Mellon, in appearing before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, discussed this measure, and from his testimony I wish to quote as follows:

It is not appropriating money to be loaned to the farmers or to be used in any way excepting to facilitate the functioning of the banks to enable them to accumulate and dispose of their bonds, and the present exigency makes it desirable to keep these banks in shape to have funds on hand to make loans so that on account of the present situation it would seem to me to be a desirable measure.

In response to Representative DUNBAR's question, "You have expressed yourself as favorable to this measure," Secretary Mellon answered, "Yes," and to the second question, "And you think it ought to pass Congress," Secretary Mellon answered, "I think so."

A DEPOSIT AND NOT AN INVESTMENT.

That the privilege of deposit provided by this bill is not and can not be regarded as a charge upon the Treasury or as a disbursement item chargeable to the expense of the Government, and that it is only a deposit and does not involve an appropriation, is conclusively pointed out by Secretary Mellon in the following excerpt from his testimony:

Mr. DUNBAR. Now, then, if this $50,000,000 is deposited in these farm loan banks, will that appear as a disbursement item chargeable to the expense of the Government the same as the purchase of farm loan bank bonds have appeared?

Secretary MELLON. No; it would be merely in the nature of a deposit.

Mr. DUNBAR. Merely in the nature of a deposit, and not in the nature of a disbursement?

Secretary MELLON. Yes.

It is also to be noted in this connection that the present amount of $6,000,000 permitted to be deposited in the Federal land banks under section 32 of the Federal farm loan act has been deposited in these banks several times, and has been returned by the banks to the Treasury without any provision of appropriation, but merely, as indicated and stated so positively by the Secretary of the Treasury, as a deposit. I want to emphasize this because there seems to be an erroneous conception in the minds of many that this is an appropriation—an expenditure. We must not be confused, but have clearly in mind that this is not an appropriation nor an expenditure, but is merely in the form of a deposit in the Federal land banks, to be used by them in accumulating their mortgages to the amount of the deposit, and when the bonds for these mortgages are sold the money is again returned to the Treasury. It is in the same nature as the deposits now made by the Treasury in Federal reserve banks and other national banks, upon which the Government receives interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum.

NOT A TAX BURDEN.

I want to call your attention to the fact, which has been so clearly stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, that this measure provides for a deposit, and not a disbursement or an expenditure, and does not, therefore, involve an appropriation. Inasmuch as the return obtained by the Treasury is 3½ per cent more than received on ordinary Treasury deposits, it is clearly to be seen that it is a profit rather than an expense to the Government, and can not be regarded in any way as a tax burden on the people of the United States.

The measure guards against any abuse of the depository privilege in that it makes the Federal land banks pay a penalty of one-half of 1 per cent to the Treasury of the United States by requiring the banks to pay for the deposits from the Treasury one-half of 1 per cent per annum more than they pay upon their outstanding bonds.

NOT A PERMANENT NECESSITY.

From the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, it was very apparent that the normal increase of the capital stock of the banks attendant upon their continued loaning operations would eventually provide them with sufficient capital to entirely do away with the occasion for the Treasury deposits. This possibility comes from the fact that with every loan made there is a subscription to the capital stock of the land bank equal to 5 per cent of the amount of the loan, thus an annual business of $200,000,000 in loans would result in an increase of the capital in the sum of $10,000,000.

Commissioner Lobdell states that if the banks at present had a capital of $50,000,000 there would be no occasion to make use of this deposit privilege. It will thus be seen that if the banks should transact a business of $200,000,000 a year for three years, the capital thus accumulated on new business added to their present capital of $24,500,000 would provide them with sufficient funds of their own for an orderly turnover on business, and there would be no further occasion to make use of this depository privilege.

Indeed, I want to emphasize at this point the statement made by Commissioner Lobdell that this must be the maximum relief offered to the banks, and that not a dollar more must be asked by them, and I wish to say right here that if the Farm Loan Board can not function with this aid, then I think it is just as well that the farm loan banks admit that they are a failure and be immediately liquidated. But it is the belief of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Farm Loan Board and of all experts in the Federal land banks that this amendment to the act will enable the banks to function and to render the relief necessary and make the banks a success. Fifty to seventy-five millions of dollars of capital stock is sufficient and will provide the elasticity necessary to make continuous loaning possible.

I want to impress upon you the fact that the deposit made by the Treasury in the several land banks is secured by farm loan bonds or other security acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, so that the deposit itself is absolutely secured to the Government.

ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE FEDERAL FARM LOAN SYSTEM.

Before the establishment of the Federal farm loan system a so-called long-time farm mortgage loan based on the land and its improvements was usually a straight mortgage made for three or five years, the mortgage becoming due in a lump sum at the end of the period. By the payment of high commissions and other charges, which varied in different parts of the country, the mortgages could be renewed for another period of three to five years. It is thus seen that the farmer, unless he could save enough money to reduce and finally pay off his debt, became more or less involved in financial bondage to his own detriment, and as a consequence agriculture waned to such an extent in some parts of the country that it became a matter of national importance which led to agitation and Government investigation.

As far back as the Roosevelt administration a commission was appointed to investigate and report on country-life conditions, and again in Taft's administration our ambassadors in the various countries were authorized to report on rural credits and agricultural cooperation in the respective countries to which they were assigned. These investigations and reports laid the foundation for the present Federal farm loan system, which makes farm-mortgage loans on long-time amortization plan of repayment and at a comparative low rate of interest. Prior to the establishment of the farm loan system the Farm Loan Board found that some farmers were paying as high as 15 per cent interest a year, besides commissions and other charges on loans running up longer than five years. The farm loan system has reduced the average rate of interest to the farmer and has established a normal and equitable rate of interest throughout the entire Nation, the maximum rate being 6 per cent, without any commissions being charged.

The primary object of the law was to provide capital for agricultural development and money to be loaned to farmers for productive purposes at reasonable rates of interest. Only first-mortgage loans can be made on farms or farm lands, and two kinds of land banks were authorized to make these loans, one known as the Federal land banks, which make loans through agents or through national farm loan associations and cooperative organizations, and the other known as the joint-stock land banks, which are operated by private capital but subject to the maximum rate of interest, 6 per cent, on their loans and to restrictions in their operations, provided by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Twelve Federal land banks were organized largely by Government capital, the amount subscribed by the Government being $8,891,270, out of a minimum of $9,000,000 authorized. The balance of the capital was subscribed by private individuals. This capital, however, is to be repaid, and part of it had been paid back on March 31, 1921. The capital stock of the Federal land banks owned by the Government had been reduced to $6,700,675, showing that $2,190,595 had been repaid by the Federal land banks to the Government. On March 31, 1921, the capital of these banks was made up as follows:

United States Government	$6,700,675
National farm loan associations	17,670,217
Borrowers through agents	79,480
Individual subscribers	10,380
Total	24,460,752

National farm loan associations may be organized in any locality with not less than 10 members, whose subscriptions for loans can not be less than $20,000. Loans now made at 6 per cent range from $100 to $10,000 and are on the amortization plan of repayment. The associations are chartered by the Federal Farm Loan Board. Originally loans were made at 5 per cent interest. In about nine months after the first loan was made the interest rate was advanced to 5½ per cent. At the present time the rate is 6 per cent, as a result of the financial conditions prevailing throughout the country.

I wish to call the especial attention of Congress to the fact that while the Federal farm loan system was operating and making loans to the farmers private and corporate lenders of money were supplying money to the farmers at the same rate of interest. But, during the cessation of the loaning operations by the Federal farm loan system, because of the testing of the constitutionality of the law under the tax-exempt feature, we find that the farmers were immediately compelled to pay excessive rates of interest, running as high as 8 per cent in the very best agricultural districts of the country and exorbitant commissions besides.

The rapid growth of this cooperative plan of farm-mortgage credit may be clearly realized by studying the following table, which gives by States the number of associations chartered, the number of loans granted, the total amount of the loans, and the average loan made in each State as of December 31, 1920:

[1] Of this total number 173 charters have been canceled by consolidation or otherwise, by Federal land bank districts, as follows: Springfield, 3; Baltimore, 2; Columbia, 12; Louisville, 18; New Orleans, 3; St. Louis, 23; St. Paul, 9; Omaha, 5; Wichita, 64; Houston, 18; Berkeley, 15; Spokane, 1. Therefore, on December 31, 1920, there were 3,966 national farm loan associations in actual operation.

FUNDS FOR LENDING TO FARMERS.

The money which the Federal land banks lend to farmers is not furnished by the Government unless the Government buys the bonds issued by the banks. Funds are provided by the sale of bonds to the investing public. Bonds are of various denominations to meet the needs of persons having money to invest. Under a recent amendment to the farm loan act approved March 4, 1921, bonds for small investors are authorized at $40 and $100; for large investors at $500, $1,000, or larger denominations. These bonds make a safe investment for savings, as they draw interest at 5 per cent at the present time.

THE FARM LOAN SYSTEM IS AN ESTABLISHED FACT.

The policy of providing capital for agricultural development through an organization supplying long-time credit on farm mortgages based on the amortization plan of repayment of principal, under the supervisory authority of the Government, was settled by Congress in the enactment of the farm loan act, and has since been indorsed in principle by both of the great political parties.

The Federal land banks must, therefore, without regard to individual views as to the soundness of the policy, be accepted to-day as an integral and permanent part of our financial system, and it is the duty of everyone charged with official responsibility to facilitate their orderly functioning in every reasonable way. This is clearly the view of Secretary Mellon, as indicated by the following statement made before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House:

> If you are going back to just the broad question of policy, I believe that the policy for an organization to issue tax-free bonds for any class of borrowers is not a sound one. But the legislation has been enacted, and these organizations are going on, and if ever the situation requires the aid of the Government to the farm loan banks now is the time.

It is quite clear, therefore, that in these days of stress it would be absolutely wrong to uproot a system which is doing so much good to our fundamental industry—farming. And, in this statement, the Secretary, with his broad experience and sound financial judgment, recognizes the existence of a situation which requires the open door of every agency operating under Government auspices which may in any measure provide credit relief for agriculture.

RESULTS UNDER THE FEDERAL FARM LOAN SYSTEM.

It has equalized the rate of interest, reducing the exorbitant charges to a maximum of 6 per cent. It has made it possible for landless tenants to become landowners on the amortized plan of repayment. It is estimated that the farmers of America have been saved in commissions not less than $20,000,000 and not less than $30,000,000 in interest as a result of the competition of the banks created by the farm loan act. Notwithstanding the prevalence of drought and unfavorable climatic conditions in several Federal land bank districts and the very stringent credit situation now existing, the total delinquencies on March 31, 1921, amounted to approximately 2 per cent of the matured payments, and during the four years of the existence of the system the foreclosures have been so few that the Federal land banks have not reported them to the Federal Farm Loan Board for action. Only in rare instances have the banks resorted to foreclosure proceedings because of the failure of the borrowers to meet their regular installments on the loans.

The Federal farm loan system has, therefore, demonstrated its great economic value, and is full of promise for the development and welfare of our great agricultural interests of the Nation.

SOME OBJECTIONS RAISED AGAINST THE FARM LOAN SYSTEM.

It may be urged that this is granting a special privilege to the farmers, and that the farm loan system itself is a form of subsidy in that its instrumentalities are exempt from taxation. If the system carries a subsidy for agriculture, I think this is justified on the ground that agriculture is fundamental to civilization and life, and that every occupation has a direct and vital interest in the adequate production of farm products. I believe I am right in saying that no other industry lends itself so substantially and is of such absolute necessity to all other industries and activities as is agriculture, and no complaint against this slight privilege to agriculture is heard save perhaps from those who heretofore have controlled a monopoly on the farm-mortgage business of the country.

The objection raised against this bill that the bonds are tax exempt and that we should not increase tax-exempt securities, I think is well founded, and I wish to say that I am fully agreed with these critics and am ready immediately to vote to prohibit all future issues of tax-free securities of any and all kinds. But this raises a very fundamental question of the constitutional rights of the States, and we all agree that we do not have any right to make any such restriction without an amendment to the Constitution.

We are told that there are about $16,000,000,000 of tax-exempt securities afloat in this country to-day, increasing by a billion dollars every year; whereas the total amount of farm-loan bonds issued by both the joint-stock land banks and Federal land banks amount to approximately $427,000,000. Therefore it does seem to me that the argument does not lie with any weight against the continuation on the part of the Federal farm loan system to sell tax-exempt bonds to encourage a basic industry and to turn the tide of population as far as possible from the city to the farm.

Why attack the farmers' interest first, when they only have about 2⅔ per cent of the estimated tax-exempt securities? Moreover, mutual savings banks, securities of which the revenue bill especially exempts, hold, according to the last available statement, in excess of $2,000,000,000 of mortgages, and the depositors, who get the benefit of this tax exemption, are mostly city dwellers. The mutual building and loan associations, the securities of which are likewise exempt, had, according to the last published statement, in excess of $1,700,000,000 of tax-free securities. This benefit accrues to urban populations exclusively. In other words, I believe that we should not make an attack upon the small portion of tax-free bonds for the benefit of the farmer when we have the flood of tax-exempt securities largely in the interest of the urban populations.

In conclusion I wish to say that in view of all these facts it does seem to me that no valid objection can be raised against the passage of this bill. Those who object to the Government doing anything in a special way should remember that this system is already inaugurated. We are now responsible for it, and we should either remove it altogether or else make it function. Nothing can be more pitiful than to put a system in operation that has not the proper facilities to operate efficiently and successfully. So far as Government aid is concerned, there is ample precedent in every conceivable way in the past, because the Government has rendered aid to innumerable projects, such as has been given to the railroads, reclamation projects, tariffs, and so forth.

Briefly, therefore, the reasons why I believe this bill should be passed are as follows:

(1) To aid and encourage a basic industry in a time of nation-wide agricultural distress.

(2) To stop the unscrupulous money lender from charging exorbitant rates and commissions and enable the farmer to refinance his past-due mortgage loans now threatened with foreclosures in every section of the country.

(3) To aid the tiller of the soil to produce, sell, and buy, and thus start our stagnant industries in operation and put our idle millions to work.

(4) To liquidate the long-time credits in our country banks and give these banks a chance to locally finance the farmers in short-time loans for their immediate needs.

The passage of this bill will help to renew business activity and continued progress in every line of agriculture, commerce, and industry. Its spirit of constructive cooperation will help to make our Nation more socially happy and economically contented. I plead alike for the farmer and the laborer, the manufacturer and the business man, because the welfare and happiness of all rest primarily on the successful and contented tiller of the soil. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, a year ago, when the deflation processes began to be acute, the power to loan money to the farmers of this country by the farm loan banks was tied up by injunction and was kept tied up by injunction of the Supreme Court for 12 months. To make it worse, about the 30th of May, 1920, the Supreme Court of the United States announced that it could not determine the case as to the constitutionality of the farm loan act, and ordered a reargument to be held in October, and of course that put a conclusive end to any selling of any obligations of the farm loan system and raised a doubt as to its constitutionality which was much greater than ever existed before.

Immediately the price of farm products under the deflation processes began to go down. The wheat of the West became a drug in the market, the cotton of the South was deflated from 40 cents to 15 cents a pound. The banks that had loaned to make these crops under the most expensive conditions that ever had been made were unable to collect because the farmer was unable to sell his crop for enough to pay the debt contracted to make the crop. That went on and got worse, and the farmers were called on to liquidate their indebtedness. Under the policy adopted by the Federal Reserve Board very many had to liquidate their indebtedness, and many of them have not yet had to do it, but they have gone ahead, and in many instances, notably in the West, have sold the crop against which the obligation exists, and it has paid but a small per cent of the obligation which was contracted in making the crop.

The result is that in the banks of this country there is this agricultural paper uncovered except by the solvency of the individual who signed the notes, the original source of the payment having been sold and dissipated for much less than the obligation which existed. The commercial banks, therefore, are tied up, and as we are passing we might say that the Federal Reserve Board has not forced them to liquidate this paper in many instances, and they are entitled to some credit for that. These banks are tied up with paper on which if they forced payment to-day much of it would be worthless, and great losses would be entailed on the banks. The farmers are here asking us to enable the farm loan banks to put enough money behind them to allow them to put up their real estate and get the money to liquidate the indebtedness that is in the banks and save the situation and prevent a catastrophe in this country, from a financial standpoint, that will probably cost us 10 years of depression to get over unless it is done. That is the situation which confronts this country. It is no ordinary situation; it is no local situation.

Gentlemen from the extreme Northwest, gentleman from the Middle West, gentlemen from the far West, from the South, and from the Southwest, all unite in making the statement that if the farmers can borrow the money on their real estate on the same scale that the Federal Farm Loan Board can loan it, they could liquidate much of this uncovered indebtedness that is in the banks and enable the wheels of business to begin to turn in this country and relieve the banks from being forced into liquidation. That being the case, we find $140,000,000 of applications for loans by farmers of this country under this emergency. The Federal Farm Loan Board finds that selling bonds is rather slow. They sold $40,000,000 this spring. They can not sell more than $40,000,000 at one time and they can not sell them every 30 days. They have got to get the money to tide along and loan to the farmers and take their mortgages on their lands and sell the bonds as they can. Hence they asked for a revolving fund of $50,000,000. The Senate very promptly passed a bill giving it to them. It came to the House of Representatives and went to the Banking and Currency Committee, and some weeks ago it was reported out of that committee by a divided committee. The report never was filed. Influences were brought to bear to cut down the amount and get unity of action. I have not any question but that the bill carrying $50,000,000, as originally reported, would have been passed overwhelmingly in this House if the House could have had a vote upon it, but it never got to that point. It went back to the committee and then the Farm Loan Board came down there and stated that they were entirely satisfied with the $25,000,000 that this provides additional. Let us see about that. The Farm Loan Board came there. We had a discussion, and they were present. They were asked, "Is that not enough? Will not this answer the purpose?"

The chairman of the board was hesitant, but he said, "Yes; we can get along with this." I said, "This would constitute a life-saver—that is what it would be, is it not?" That is the exact language used, and he repeated it. He says, "Yes; this will be a life-saver, and that is all there is to it." Fifty million dollars would be much better, $100,000,000 would be much better still, because by next fall the condition that confronts us now will be probably relieved by the cheapness of making the crops this year and a possible reaction in prices, but now is the time when these men need to liquidate their debts in the bank, and therefore we stand for the bill as originally passed by the Senate, because it gives more in this emergency than this bill does by $20,000,000 and because there will be no hanging up of the bill when it goes to the Senate by a conference. If a man is drowning, if you are going to send him a life preserver, you ought not to wait until he drowns before you give it to him; but you should give it to him now, and that is what we want to do.

Talk about $50,000,000 being very heavy! Some people say that we want to give the farmers special privilege. Let us see what this bill provides. It provides for a deposit of $25,000,000 at a rate of interest one-half of 1 per cent higher than the rate of interest which they get on their bonds, which is a penalty. It is a rate of interest 3½ per cent higher than they charge the national banks of the country; it is higher than they charge a special depository, or a foreign depository, when they deposit their money. That is no special privilege; that is a penalty for being poor.

The last Treasury report which tells us where the money of the United States is deposited says that $75,000,000 are deposited in the Federal reserve banks. They have power of issuing Federal reserve notes, gold reserves, and to-day they would be able to issue $2,000,000,000 more than is outstanding. They have in their account now $39,000,000 of profit that is due the United States, which has not been turned over to the President. Yet people talk about its being hard to give the farmers $50,000,000 in their banks and charge them 5½ per cent for it. Let us see where the other money is. Deposits in special depositories, $542,000,000. Those depositories pay only 2 per cent interest. To the credit of the United States in foreign depositories, $681,000, and to the credit of Government offices in foreign depositories, $53,843,000. Yet you say it will not do to give a deposit in the banks of $50,000,000 to the credit of the farmers, when you have $55,000,000 deposited in foreign depositories under an act which we passed here during this Congress, deposited for the purpose of fostering commerce and enabling the Government's transactions to go on easily over there.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. What interest does the $55,000,000 in foreign depositories yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. So far as I know, absolutely none. In the national banks of this country there are $20,000,000 deposited, and they pay 2 per cent. Yet you talk about its being a great act of grace to loan $25,000,000 to the farmers' banks at 5½ per cent.

I submit that the Senate bill ought to be passed, and it ought to be passed just as it is without writing another mark upon it. I would be willing to amend it to make it $100,000,000, and say to the people of this country that the basic interest of this country is endangered, and that if they do not provide for liquidating their hold overs from last year's crops, they are going to bring down the whole structure of finance of the country banks on their heads and bring destruction on the financial interests of this country.

Now, is there any reason why money should not be available? What is going on in this country? In 12 months our gold reserve was increased from 49 per cent to 72 per cent, 32 per cent more than the law requires. Everybody is talking about hard times, and yet the ability of this country to finance itself has never been as great in the history of the country, as shown in the last report of the Federal reserve banks. They could issue 80 per cent more Federal reserve notes than are outstanding to-day and still protect their gold reserve, and in the name of common sense what is gold for and what is money for if it is not to be used in time of financial stress? Are we hoarding it when we want to use it? I want to say that the time has come when there ought to be a loosening up of credits in this country, and there ought to be a loosening up because you are building up a hoarding system until we will get to a point where popular sentiment will break down and overthrow your board and bring destruction to your whole financial system. Now, let us get at another thing. The Federal reserve notes 12 months ago were $3,104,000,000. To-day there are $2,674,000,000. In other words, they have got a half billion dollars less notes outstanding and we have got more than five hundred million more free gold reserve. Then, I say, there is no reason in the world why this permission should not be given to the Secretary of the Treasury. I want to call attention to another thing about this: They say that you must not put the word "shall" in here when you are dealing with the Secretary of the Treasury about his deposits. You must not use the word "shall" in reference to deposits. No, no; leave it to his discretion, but when it comes over to the part about paying it back, it says that 15 days after the conclusion of the general offering of Federal land bonds the Treasurer "shall" demand a repayment of the $25,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I have one minute more?

Mr. WINGO. I yield the gentleman an additional minute.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, if you do not want to make it imperative to make him deposit it, why make it imperative to require him to call it, whether they are prepared to pay or not?

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is aware, of course, that the suggestion is from Mr. Lobdell, one of the commissioners?

Mr. STEVENSON. That may be, but Mr. Lobdell does not happen to be a member of the legislative department of this Government. I am tired of hearing that just because somebody says it, we should do so-and-so. I am a Representative of 240,000 people, and they expect me to exercise my judgment, regardless of Mr. Lobdell or anybody else, and I propose, if somebody else does not do it, to move to strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may," and have it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury in both instances as to whether he will make deposits and whether he will call it in 15 days. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

A GOVERNMENT BOUNTY ON CANADIAN LUMBER WOULD BE MORE DEFENSIBLE THAN A TARIFF.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, one of the big things, perhaps, the most important thing standing in way of reduction of prices, is rent, and the biggest factor in rent, at least so far as it can be affected by legislation in Congress, is lumber.

REPUBLICAN CAUCUS PROBABLE.

Every day it becomes more evident that the Members of the House will insist upon a Republican conference in respect to lumber duties. In order that those who attend this conference, or caucus, as it is used to be called, may have before them in convenient form the main facts in respect to the proposed duty on dressed lumber, I have undertaken to present to the House a considerable amount of information in respect to the lumber industry, both in the United States and in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, any duty imposed against lumber can be justified only from the standpoint of revenue or that the lumber industry is suffering from foreign competition and is in need of tariff protection.

LUMBER TARIFF FROM REVENUE STANDPOINT INDEFENSIBLE.

It is my contention that it can not under any circumstances be defended from the standpoint of revenue for the reason that the proposed duty of 25 per cent ad valorem reported in the newspapers will be absolutely prohibitive. Under such a duty I doubt if a single board of finished lumber would be imported excepting under unusual conditions, when demand might exceed supply. It is conceivable that under such conditions if there were such a thing possible as a building boom lumber prices might reach a point where there would be some importations; but the duties collected would be negligible. Upon hardwood flooring it would amount to from $8 to $20 per thousand feet, depending upon the quality, and later I shall give the figures on other kinds of dressed lumber.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM DELIGHTFULLY INDEFINITE.

From the standpoint of protection it is also unjustifiable. There was a time when Republicans used to believe that the tariff should measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, to which at times was added the idea that there should also be a reasonable profit to the American manufacturer, but I see from the Republican platform adopted last year in Chicago that while the attention of those in the convention, as well as those outside of it, was centered on other questions of absorbing interest, an entirely new measure of protection was announced in these words:

> The Republican Party reaffirms its belief in the protective principles and pledges itself to a revision of the tariff as soon as conditions shall make it necessary for the preservation of the home market for American labor, agriculture, and industry.

This tariff plank is so delightfully indefinite that the party is not pledged to a revision either upward or downward. But our duty to do the rational thing in respect to the tariff on lumber, as well as other commodities, is none the less obligatory upon us.

Getting back of our most recent party utterance as to the tariff to a time when our people were thinking more about it, I think we should approach the consideration of a duty on lumber from the standpoint of the relative costs of production between this country and Canada, which is our only competitor covering that commodity. Those who seek a duty on lumber must show that if they are granted a duty by this House, that production costs, including freight rates by reason of a longer haul, are lower in Canada than in our country. This they have been utterly unable to do up to this time.

NO COUNTRY CAN MAKE LUMBER SO CHEAPLY AS OURS.

Mr. Chairman, it is my belief that no country in the world can manufacture lumber in commercial quantities as cheaply as the United States, and that Canada, our only competitor, is no exception.

Let us consider, first, the element of labor. Based upon the reported cut in the United States as contained in the last available bulletin, No. 845, of the United States Department of Agriculture, and the wages paid in 1921, and based upon the total Canadian cut for 1919, which is the last available from the Dominion statistics on lumber cut, and the wages paid in 1921, we get the following results:

LABOR CHEAPER IN UNITED STATES.

Mr. Chairman, the average wage paid at the present time for common labor in Canada is greater than in the United States.

Average wage: Canada, $3.37 per day; United States, $2.86 per day.

UNITED STATES.

13,354,418,000 board feet manufactured on the basis of 20 cents per hour, 10-hour day.

9,746,848,000 board feet manufactured on the basis of 45 cents per hour, 8-hour day.

6,260,754,000 board feet manufactured on the basis of 35 cents per hour, 10-hour day.

Average common labor, $2.86 per day.

CANADA.

1,432,068,000 board feet manufactured on basis of 35 cents per hour and 9-hour day.

2,694,915,000 board feet manufactured on basis of 35 cents per hour and 10-hour day.

Average common labor, $3.37 per day.

The average wage paid in 1920 for common labor was also greater in Canada than in the United States.

Average wage: Canada, $4.82 per day; United States, $3.88 per day.

UNITED STATES.

13,354,418,000 board feet manufactured on the basis of 30 cents per hour common-labor rate and 10-hour day.

9,746,848,000 board feet manufactured on the basis of 55 cents per hour common-labor rate and 8-hour day.

6,260,754,000 board feet manufactured on the basis of 50 cents per hour common-labor rate and 10-hour day.

Average common labor, $3.88 per day.

CANADA.

1,432,068,000 board feet manufactured on basis of 50 cents per hour common-labor rate and 9-hour day.

2,694,915,000 board feet manufactured on basis of 50 cents per hour, 10-hour day.

Average common labor, $4.82 per day.

The relative labor costs are well supported by the fact that we are shipping two and one-half million dollars' worth of lumber per month to one Canadian Province—Ontario.

LUMBERMEN NOT UNITED FOR A TARIFF.

Mr. Chairman, the lumbermen themselves are by no means united in the request for a duty on lumber. Mr. John Kirby, president of the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, whose remarks can be found in the printed hearings before our committee, said that a duty on lumber could not be justified from the standpoint of protection, although he did say that the Government ought to pick up some revenue out of the importations. Evidently he had no thought that a duty so high as 25 per cent ad valorem would be proposed, because such a duty, for the reasons already stated, can not be regarded as a revenue duty, because the rate is practically prohibitive.

Many of the lumber manufacturers are opposed to the imposition of a duty on lumber, perhaps a majority of them. It is said by those who wish a duty on lumber that only those particular manufacturers who own mills both in the United States and Canada are in favor of free lumber. That statement is not true and can not be borne out by the facts. It is possible, however, to obtain very valuable figures from those particular concerns which do own mills in both the United States and Canada, because such concerns can give us accurate costs of production in both countries.

Here is a statement from a lumber concern which owns mills in both Minnesota and Ontario. Everyone knows, of course, that Ontario joins Minnesota on the east. The statement compares operations in western Ontario and eastern Minnesota, as follows:

[1] Prevailing wage at present time.

It will be noted that the existing (1921 basis) wages in Ontario are higher than in Minnesota. During 1919 and 1920 and 1921 Ontario labor paid in American money.

These two operations cut the same species of timber, they are nearly the same size, and their method of manufacture is the same.

NOTE.—The wages paid in Minnesota and western Ontario during 1919 and 1920 were practically identical. The wages paid in Ontario at present and the 1921 basis are higher than Minnesota.

LUMBER MANUFACTURING COST ON PACIFIC COAST CHEAPER THAN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. Chairman, turning to the matter of wages paid on the west coast, where fir and spruce are produced west of the Cascade Mountains and pine east of the Cascade Mountains, which also applies to British Columbia as well as Washington and Oregon, I wish to direct the attention of the House to the fact that the west coast of the United States has been operating on an eight-hour day as against nine hours in British Columbia. For that reason the average wage per hour on our west coast for the lower classes of labor is somewhat higher than in British Columbia, but this is offset by the added efficiency of the American laborer. The west coast producers themselves admitted to the Ways and Means Committee that their labor was more efficient. As to the higher classes of labor and skilled labor there is practically no difference in wages, although one mill in British Columbia may pay greater wages for a sawyer than a certain mill in Washington, and vice versa.

The claim is made by those who desire a tariff that oriental labor in British Columbia is a material competitive factor. There are approximately 4,200 orientals in British Columbia in the woods, sawmills, and shingle mills, and approximately 6,000 orientals in like employment in the States of Oregon and Washington. As compared to our total consumption only one three-hundredths of the lumber used by this country is entirely manufactured by oriental labor in British Columbia. Hardly a competitive factor!

The timber licenses issued by the British Columbia Government forbid the employment of Japanese and Chinese in logging operations. Besides, labor costs are only useful as one factor of the total costs of production.

As to the total costs of producing lumber in Canada and the United States, the committee has before it figures which compare the costs of production of the various species of wood and producing districts of Canada and the United States. The cost of producing pine lumber in one country is compared with the cost of producing pine in the other; the cost of producing fir and spruce lumber in one country is compared with fir and spruce of the other. Composite figures for groups of mills must be used in order to reflect the competition of the average of all grades produced. I have taken as a basis of my comparison the costs of production during the year 1920, as submitted by the various lumber associations throughout Canada and the United States. These statements were compiled prior to the discussion of this tariff legislation. They are:

Total cost of producing southern pine, 1920, $31.21 per 1,000 board feet, as submitted by the Southern Pine Association.

Total cost of producing pine lumber in eastern Ontario, as submitted by the Lumber Association, at Ottawa, Canada, for the entire year of 1920, $38.10 per 1,000 board feet.

Total cost of producing fir and spruce on our west coast during 1920, as submitted in printed cost statements of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, $33.76 per 1,000 board feet.

Total cost of producing fir and spruce in British Columbia, as submitted in printed cost statements of the British Columbia Lumbermen's Association, $36.77 per 1,000 board feet.

These figures are amplified and explained in the condensed operating statements of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association and the British Columbia Lumbermen's Association.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON], who has taken a very active part in the fight for free lumber, has handed to me these very valuable tabulated statements showing the comparative costs of producing lumber on the Pacific Coast States and British Columbia. I shall ask to have both of these statements printed in the RECORD. They are well worth the study of every Member of the House.

LABORERS GO BACK AND FORTH TO CANADA.

But, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the most conclusive thing which can be cited to show that the lumber costs are practically the same in Canada as in the United States is the fact that labor goes back and forth between one country and the other. My esteemed colleague from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] brought this situation to light, as will be seen by the foregoing dialogue, which occurred at the public hearings before our committee:

Mr. COLLIER. And you don't want any protection on lumber, but just revenue?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I don't think we particularly need protection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Have you made any inquiry as to the cost of production of the competing product in Canada?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. Can they manufacture a thousand feet for a less price than you can?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think not, sir. Our wages are the same. Our workmen exchange some.

Mr. Saunders is a Michigan lumberman.

COST TO AMERICAN CONSUMERS.

Now, as to what it will cost American consumers: First of all, it depends on the wording of the lumber paragraph as finally carried in the bill.

If the bill when it shall have been finally considered and finally agreed upon and reported embraces all planed lumber as well as lumber tongued and grooved, it will cover 100 per cent of all imported dressed lumber; if it embraces only lumber which is tongued and grooved, it will cover about 50 per cent of all imported dressed lumber.

Dressed lumber, which includes all siding, ceiling, flooring, ship-lap, sheathing, and partition, is the chief requirement for houses, barns, garages, machine sheds, and storehouses, now so scarce all over the country. An ad valorem duty on these items will mean a duty of from $5 to $12 per thousand feet on the softwoods, depending on the quality, and from $8 to $20 per thousand on hardwood flooring.

It is up to us to face this problem squarely. Those who are satisfied with having only rough lumber free are those who will be content with a house where the snow will sift through in the winter and the flies crawl through in the summer.

Here is an average estimate of the increase of cost to the building of dwellings and farm construction if a 25 per cent ad valorem tax is adopted and is taken full advantage of by the manufacturers.

Wholesale, not retail, prices are given.

At Manhattan, Kans.: One farmhouse of 7 rooms and one barn of lumber.

Total footage of all lumber, 50,000 board feet, one-third of which will be dressed one side and one edge; the balance will be worked to pattern, such as flooring, siding, ceiling, partition, and sheathing, which can properly be classed as tongue-and-grooved material.

Approximate present price of total material:

16,000 feet at $35	$560.00
34,000 feet at $50	1,700.00
100,000 shingles at $6	600.00
Total	2,860.00
Duty increases 16,000 feet by $5 per 1,000 feet	80.00
Duty increases 34,000 feet by $8.75 per 1,000 feet	297.50
Duty increases shingles by 60 cents per 1,000	60.00
Total increase in wholesale prices by duty	437.50

At Lexington, Nebr.: One farm, 7-room house of lumber.

Total footage of lumber, 22,000 board feet.

If amended schedules means that any lumber finished on one or more sides is dutiable, the entire amount above is taxed.

Total present cost:
6,000 at $36	$216.00
16,000 at $50	800.00

Duty increases 40,000 shingles by 60 cents	24.00

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not come into the House in time to hear the gentleman's opening remarks. Do I understand the gentleman is now making a statement as to the action of the Committee on Ways and Means on lumber?

Mr. YOUNG. No; I have not made any statement of what action the Ways and Means Committee has taken, but I will say to the gentleman that the newspapers of the country have carried statements repeatedly, apparently handed out by those in favor of a duty, that a duty will be carried on certain classes of lumber, and they have been very careful to say it is not going to be put on all classes but is going to be 25 per cent on a certain class.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is stating to this House that the committee has decided to put a duty on certain classes of lumber, is he?

Mr. YOUNG. I am stating that the committee has the matter of lumber duties under consideration, and I am saying that if a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem is placed on dressed lumber that it will increase the cost of the building of a house and barn at Manhattan, Kans., $437.50, provided the manufacturers of this country take full advantage of that duty.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has not made a definite statement that anything has been decided upon in reference to it?

Mr. YOUNG. I have not stated what the committee will finally report.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the gentleman stated what has so far been agreed upon——

Mr. YOUNG. I have not done so; but I will say the newspapers have carried the reports repeatedly, apparently handed out by those who want a duty, that it is not to be a duty on all lumber, but it is going to be confined to dressed lumber, the same amount as that charged by Canada against us, which is 25 per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have no possible objection to the gentleman stating that if the committee decided to do a certain thing then a certain result might follow, but I hope the gentleman would not state to the House with any authority whatever that the committee has decided to put a duty on lumber, or no duty on lumber, or anything which has occurred in the committee.

Mr. YOUNG. I am referring to the duty of 25 per cent now carried by Canada, and what the effect would be if we imposed a similar duty. It is a question of the greatest importance not only to the Members of this House but to the people of this country that they face the situation and know what it means.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Dakota by what authority he assumes that if there is a duty of 25 per cent put on lumber then that lumber will immediately advance 25 per cent?

Mr. YOUNG. I have not made that statement, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I think the gentleman is trying to leave that impression, though.

Mr. YOUNG. No; I made a prediction of what would happen if the manufacturers take full advantage of the duty. And I want to tell you another thing, which is that the lumbermen of the United States have not been very slow in the past in taking advantage of trade opportunities. And I will say this——

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG. In a moment. There is still another consideration, which I had not intended to mention but am going to mention, and that is that the wholesalers, who usually charge a profit of about 15 per cent, will add that to whatever duty there will be; the retailers will put on another profit of about 25 per cent of whatever the cost is to them. Then the contractor will add 10 per cent to the grand total.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. YOUNG. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Is it not a fact, though, that the price of lumber is higher to-day under the Underwood tariff bill than under the last Republican tariff bill?

Mr. YOUNG. Lumber is not as high now as it has been, but——

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Then you can not blame that on the tariff.

Mr. YOUNG. But the industry has flourished under free trade. They have enjoyed about 97½ per cent of the American lumber trade. They ought not to ask us for a high duty in order to capture the remaining 2½ per cent.

CONSERVATION OF TIMBER SUPPLY.

Conservation of our timber supply dictates a policy of free lumber.

The Chief Forester of the United States in his report issued June 1, 1920, in reply to Senate resolution 311, stated:

> Three-fifths of the original timber of the United States has gone. * * * We are using timber four times as fast as we are growing it. * * * The forests remaining are so localized as greatly to reduce their national utility. That the depletion of timber is not the sole cause of recent high prices of forest production, but it is an important contributing cause whose effects would increase steadily as depletion continues. The virgin areas of the United States covered 822,000,000 acres; they have now shrunk to one-sixth of that area.

Mr. Chairman, if Congress should enact legislation to affect lumber at all it would be more logical to pay a bounty for all Canadian lumber shipped into our country than to erect a tariff wall so high as to shut it all out.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION MAKES SERIOUS CHARGES.

As far as softwoods are concerned, I think the request for duties comes solely from the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, and other manufacturers of soft lumber throughout the country are either not particularly interested or are opposed to it. Bearing in mind that it is the West Coast Lumbermen's Association which is urging that we impose this duty, it might be well to read what the Federal Trade Commission has to say about the manufacturers who compose that association, which I think will be found very illuminating:

> Between 1915 and 1920 wholesale quotations on fir lumber increased from 300 per cent to 500 per cent, and most items doubled in price after the armistice. Notwithstanding substantial reductions since the spring of 1920, on some items quotations still range about as they were in May and June, 1919, and on others as they were in the spring of 1917. On substantial portions of the production present quotations are still more than double the October, 1915, prices. Fir logs are quoted as of May, 1921, at prices identical with those which were fixed by the War Industries Board as the war-time maximum, and which the loggers continued in force as the minimum until June, 1919. These comparisons are based upon the published quotations of the manufacturers and loggers.
> The loggers and lumber manufacturers of the Douglas fir region are organized for the purpose of taking concerted action on the prices of logs and lumber, supporting the prices so fixed by means of concerted restriction of production.
> The relation between the fir-log and lumber markets is such that ordinary manufacturing profits tend to be absorbed in the price of logs and the valuation of timber, particularly on falling wholesale lumber markets. The frequent and present claims of unprofitable mill prices are largely explainable by the collusive action of loggers and timber-owning mills in enhancing the value of logs and standing timber.
> Despite the fact that retail prices on lumber in January, 1921, had not been reduced proportionately to the decline in wholesale prices, the manufacturers joined hands with the retailers in an advertising campaign to revive buying, which, if successful, will tend to prevent such a reduction in retail prices.

The success of the Douglas fir loggers' and manufacturers' concerted efforts to advance prices in 1913 was threatened by the importation of Canadian logs, and led to efforts to prevent such importation. Failing in this, the British Columbian loggers became affiliated with the American associations and adopted the latter's prices.

DEMAND FOR FREE LUMBER NOT SECTIONAL.

Mr. Chairman, the demand for free lumber is not sectional. It comes from all over the country—north, south, east, and west. And it is not confined to any class. The people in the cities where rents are high and where housing problems are being studied as never before, want it and want it badly. The farmers are also for it. In this connection Mr. Gray Silver, Washington representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation, wrote me on May 23 as follows:

[President, J. R. Howard, Chicago, Ill.; Washington representative, Gray Silver.]

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, MUNSEY BUILDING,
Washington, May 23, 1921.

Hon. GEORGE M. YOUNG,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. YOUNG: As you probably know, the American Farm Bureau Federation held a conference of its executive committee and representatives of State federations in Washington during the two weeks following April 11. On April 22 this conference, officially representing the entire American Farm Bureau Federation, passed a resolution, copy of which is attached, protesting against the placing of any import duty upon lumber, either in the rough or dressed state.

The total normal annual cut in this country is equivalent to about 24,000,000,000 cubic feet of standing timber (51,000,000,000 feet board measure and 110,000,000 cords of firewood). Of this amount the farmers consume close to 11,000,000,000 cubic feet, or 46 per cent of the entire cut. Agriculture, therefore, may be justly considered the greatest single wood-using industry of the United States.

Of the total saw-timber material, agriculture consumes 10,600,000,000 feet board measure, out of which 6,750,000,000 feet board measure is used for construction purposes. Nine hundred million feet board measure is made up of slack cooperage, shingles, and poles, and the balance is lumber in manufactured products purchased by the farmers. In addition to this consumption, the farmers consume 8,600,000,000 cubic feet of timber products in the form of fencing and fuel wood. The 10,600,000,000 feet board measure are equivalent to 2,400,000,000 cubic feet, making a total annual consumption of 11,000,000,000 cubic feet of lumber consumed by American agriculture.

The demand by the farming industry for lumber and timber products is steadily increasing and any curtailment in the supply of such materials will result in very serious injury to agricultural interests of the country. When we realize that the annual growth and reproduction in this country is in the neighborhood of 6,000,000,000 feet, and is mostly in the lower grades, we realize how seriously threatened is our future timber supply. With a situation such as this facing the country it would seem to us entirely impracticable to consider the placing of a duty on the importation of lumber. In fact, the conditions existing would point rather to the necessity of adopting a policy which would remove as far as possible the burden of supplying our needs from our rapidly depleting supply. Every piece of lumber imported from Canada saves just that much from our remaining supply, and therefore from a conservation angle a tariff on lumber merely serves to more rapidly deplete our own forest reserve.

We have carefully examined the testimony before your committee, and note several statements that are practically admissions on the part of the lumber interests that on a basis of cost they have nothing to fear from the importation of Canadian lumber. On the other hand, the fact that Canada imposes a 25 per cent ad valorem duty and has in addition to that an antidumping provision which allows them to further assess a 15 per cent ad valorem duty to protect Canadian lumber from American imports would strengthen our belief that our lumber does not need protection from Canadian lumber. This would leave the tariff on lumber as purely a revenue measure. It is estimated that we might possibly secure $1,500,000 returns from the proposed tariff. The absurdity of appropriating $7,000,000 for reforestation purposes and attempting to secure revenue from a tariff on importation of lumber would seem apparent on the face of it to anyone.

When, in addition to the general situation, we consider the present acute shortage of homes and the high prices still prevailing in construction work in this country we can see no possible justification for a tariff on lumber at this time.

Therefore we desire as strongly as possible to present the desires of the American Farm Bureau Federation as expressed in the attached resolution. We wish further to say that this matter has been submitted to our State and county bureaus and we have official resolutions passed by 15 State farm bureau federations and by hundreds of county farm bureaus protesting against this tariff on lumber.

Very truly, yours,

GRAY SILVER,
Washington Representative.

SHALL WE ENDANGER OUR SPLENDID TRADE WITH CANADA?

Mr. Chairman, we shall be very shortsighted, indeed, if we overlook our splendid export trade to Canada. We sell more manufactured stuff to Canada than to any other foreign country. It must be an injurious factor in securing Canadian business for the Canadians to find it necessary to pay in settlement for American goods $111 for every $100 money draft sent to our country, which they have been doing for a year or so past. It goes without saying that the reduction of our imports from Canada acts as a factor to increase the disparity in the money exchange rates between the two countries. We ought to take into account that shutting out $60,000,000 worth of lumber from Canada will be still further aggravating the money exchange situation and making it still more difficult for our manufacturers to export their products to Canada. If the lumber manufacturers were hard pressed by reason of foreign competition and in a critical condition, it might not be fair to ask them to suffer for the benefit of exporters generally throughout the United States. Fortunately no such condition has arisen in connection with the lumber industry, and it seems to me that we ought not under the circumstances to endanger our entire trade with Canada by the imposition of a foolish, indefensible duty upon lumber.

Here are some statements which I shall ask to have printed in the RECORD showing the great volume and the character of our trade with Canada.

Authority: The above figures were compiled from the report of the department of customs and inland revenue of the Dominion of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920. They show how large a proportion of goods bought by Canada from all the countries of the world are furnished by the United States. The 20 groups of articles listed above, picked at random as samples, demonstrate that in highly manufactured goods the United States supply 100 per cent, or nearly so.

Mr. Chairman, it is to be sincerely hoped that no Member will feel impelled to vote for a duty on lumber by reason of party regularity. Such a duty would be a monstrous mistake from the standpoint of the public welfare, and for that reason it would seem to be a blunder from the party standpoint which good Republicans should resist. Upon the subject of party regularity an editorial in the Chicago Tribune is in point, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD:

WHAT IS A "PROTECTIVE" TARIFF?

[From the Chicago Tribune, June 18, 1921.]

The assertion of Representative YOUNG, of North Dakota, a Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee, that many of the proposed rates in the permanent tariff schedule are too high ought not to subject him to a charge of party irregularity. Charges that his views indicate development of insurgency in the Republican ranks in Congress are ill founded.

The tariff question to-day is not what it was at the time of the adoption of the Payne-Aldrich bill, nor in the time of any previous administration since Washington. What were once clearly defined Republican policies are now affected by completely altered conditions of international trade, and by the change in the position of the United States from that of a debtor Nation to the world's chief creditor it is possible that new or slightly altered policies may be in process of formation. Until policies are revealed in the completed bill no comment or suggestion can properly be construed as irregular.

Mr. YOUNG and the entire Minnesota Republican delegation, for instance, are prepared to line up against the bill unless lumber is left on the free list. We believe that lumber ought to be left on the free list. Our own forests are so depleted and our own prices so high that all building and most lines of manufacture are handicapped. All building and most manufactures which use lumber either in their product or in shipping will be assisted by keeping it on the free list in order that we may buy from the vast supply available across our northern border. Such an arrangement is for the good of the vast majority. Certainly to advocate such a good is not against Republican principles.

Economically, we have vast interests in common with Canada. The incident of a political boundary line ought not to work to the disadvantage of those interests and to the loss of millions of people. We also have economic interests of a somewhat different kind, but of no less volume in common with other countries throughout the world. They have changed with the war to something new and puzzling. It is a task for the framers of our new tariff to protect the interests of international trade as well as to protect home industries. Without foreign markets our business and industry can not survive. We can not afford to kill such markets by barring out all their products.

It is essential to American industry and prosperity that skilled workmanship, efficient management, improved machinery, the best possible use of natural resources, and properly applied energy in every endeavor be used for its protection. If we produce at lower cost per unit of labor than foreign countries can produce, we can compete in all markets without lowering wages or standard of living. A tariff consistent with all sound Republican principles can be formulated with that idea in mind.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the pending bill because I believe it will act as a corrective of a very difficult situation and will do it in a way which is based on sound governmental policy. Of course, we all understand that the farm loan act which created the farm loan banks and the Farm Loan Board meant that the system should function, and, as the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, stated before our committee, if there ever was a time in the history of the country when it is necessary that the system should function that time is now. And I believe that no one will dissent from that point of view. Now, what do we mean, what do we have in mind, when we say that it is necessary for the system to function? We do not mean that the system is performing what we intended it should perform when it goes out and sells $40,000,000 worth of farm loan bonds and then has to suspend operation until it can provide means to float another bond issue. What was contemplated is that the system function continuously; that is to say, that it be able to make loans to the extent that the security market will absorb the farm loan bonds.

Now, the chief difficulty in the way has been this: The capital stock of the system was originally fixed too low to give it a working capital necessary to enable it to operate continuously.

The Secretary of the Treasury emphasized that fact in his testimony, and bases his recommendation for this authority to deposit upon that ground. Members of the House will, of course, recall that there are 12 of the Federal farm loan banks, each with a capital of $750,000 to start out with, making $9,000,0000 in all. That is all the working capital the system had to start with. That capital stock has been increased as loans have been made, to the extent of 5 per cent on each loan. The system now has a capital stock of about $24,000,000, but this amount is still inadequate to provide sufficient working capital.

The Federal Farm Loan Board says that it can not profitably or wisely market less than $40,000,000 of these bonds at one time. So the board has in view the plan of marketing $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 at a time, and this not more frequently than about every three months. So in order that it may do this it is necessary that some authority be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit out of the public funds a sufficient amount to enable the farm loan banks to make loans and take mortgages until they have the $40,000,000 mortgages on hand; then these will be used as a basis for the bond issue. The bonds will be sold, and the proceeds will be used, first, to the extent that it is necessary to reimburse the Treasury for the funds it has advanced, and, second, the remainder will be used in making new loans until it is exhausted. The Secretary, when available funds are again exhausted, will make a new deposit, and thereby we will get a continuous operation of the system without the Treasury really having made any investment in the bonds.

Then the question comes up, and the only question about which there seems to be a controversy, so far as I know, is whether or not it is necessary to have the full $50,000,000 provided in the original Senate bill, or whether the provision of the present bill will be adequate, which limits the authority of the Secretary in this deposit to the difference between the capital stock of the banks and the sum of $50,000,000. If the House provision is adopted, it would enable the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit, all told, about $31,000,000, because under section 32 of the original farm loan act he now has authority to deposit $6,000,000, and this would give him the authority to deposit about $25,000,000 more.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. What amount did the Secretary of the Treasury recommend, $25,000,000 or $50,000,000?

Mr. BLACK. The Secretary, when he was before our committee, said it would be acceptable to him to have the authority to deposit the $50,000,000, as originally provided in the Senate bill. But in making that recommendation Mr. Mellon stated that he based it upon the estimate of the Farm Loan Board, to the effect that such an amount would be needed to insure the continuous operation of the system. Since then the Farm Loan Board has given as its judgment that the amount authorized in this House amendment to the Senate bill will be sufficient. Not sufficient in the sense that it will enable the board to take care of all applications for loans, but in the sense that it will enable the system to operate continuously. The chairman of the Federal Farm Loan Board, Mr. Lobdell, stated that it was the opinion of the board, based upon judgment and experience, that the American market will not absorb more than $200,000,000 in farm loan bonds in any one year under present conditions. That brings me to a point which I want to discuss briefly. I can not agree—and I do not state this in order to raise a controversy with my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]—that it would be wise to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit $100,000,000; that is, I do not believe it would be wise to give him such authority, if I believed he would exercise the power to so deposit, and I will tell you why. We are not doing now in this bill what we did during the war, to wit, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to buy these bonds. We authorized the Secretary to make direct purchases of the bonds during the war, and the Treasury now holds about $183,000,000 of them. I think these bonds are perfectly safe, and that the Government will not lose one single dollar, but we are not authorizing a purchase now. We are saying, "Mr. Secretary, you deposit this money at such times as the system needs it for operation, and when the bonds are sold the Farm Loan Board will pay you back."

Now, if we should adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina and authorize the Secretary to deposit as much as $100,000,000 and he should exercise the power and deposit that much, the result would be something like this: The farm-loan banks would go ahead and make loans to the extent of $100,000,000 out of that money. Then when the Secretary, in the exercise of his discretion, should request that the bonds be sold and the Treasury reimbursed the Farm Loan Board would be confronted with the very real danger of being unable to sell the bonds at par, because of too great an offering at one time. I consider it most unwise that the board should make any effort to push upon the market more bonds than the investing public will absorb. I may say also at this point that I have the utmost confidence in the good judgment of the present Farm Loan Board, and I do not believe there is danger of their overcrowding the market.

What would be the result if a policy should be adopted of crowding these bonds upon the market faster than the investing public could absorb them? It would mean just what happened when we got more Liberty bonds on the market than the investment funds of the public could absorb; it would mean that the bonds would go down to 95, or 94, or 90, and when that should happen the system would come to a standstill. New bonds could not be marketed at par when those of prior issues were selling at much below par. So if a situation like that should arise, we would have to do either one of two things: Either pass a law directing the Secretary of the Treasury to again become the purchaser of the bonds, or else raise the rate of interest high enough to where the public would again buy them at par.

So I again repeat that I think it is a wise thing for the Farm Loan Board to endeavor to market these securities only to the extent that the public will absorb them, and I think the provisions of the House amendment will enable them to do that.

I do not profess any greater friendship for the farm-loan system than other gentlemen of the House who hold opposite views to mine, but I do contend, with becoming modesty, I hope, that none of these gentlemen are more anxious that the system function with complete success than I.

In voting for the House provision I believe that I am taking the course which is best for the success of the system. Therefore I shall not hesitate to vote the way I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the subject that I am going to discuss here is a collateral issue to this proposition.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Before the gentleman begins that, will he yield to me so that I may ask him a question suggested by the last speaker?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If $40,000,000 worth of bonds or $50,000,000 worth are put on the market and they are sold and the farm-loan bank is required to pay the proceeds back into the Treasury, to pay off the loan on the Treasury as made, will not that put the farm-loan bank at the end of three months in the same position that it is now in, with no cash on hand?

Mr. McFADDEN. No; because they have the $25,000,000 of working capital, and have the right under this law to go back to the Treasury and ask for additional amounts each month or as they accumulate mortgages.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. As I understand, they pay it back and borrow it again?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes. They pay it back and borrow it again. The gentleman has the right idea.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the gentleman goes on with the collateral matter that he has in mind, will he inform the committee what the Treasury contemplates doing with respect to the $200,000,000 of farm-loan bonds that the Government purchased during the war as an aid to the Federal farm loan banks?

Mr. McFADDEN. I can not speak for the Secretary of the Treasury, but I think that matter was referred to in the hearings. My recollection is that the Secretary said that at an opportune time, if the market permitted, he would dispose of those bonds. But that is a matter for him to determine.

I will say to the gentleman that the future disposition of those bonds is at the discretion of the Secretary, and I have no doubt he will use good judgment in determining the matter.

In view of the fact that it has been indicated that the tariff bill will be, at a very early date, presented to the House for consideration, by the Committee on Ways and Means, which will permit this important committee to take up the consideration of the revenue measure, I deem this a most opportune time to direct the attention, not only of the Committee on Ways and Means, having in charge the framing of revenue legislation, but the whole House to House joint resolution 102, introduced by myself, proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States for the purpose of terminating the evil of tax exemption.

This resolution is quite similar to the amendment which I introduced in December, 1920.

The introduction of this constitutional amendment is in accord with the recommendation which Secretary of the Treasury Mellon makes to Congress in his letter to Chairman FORDNEY, of the Committee on Ways and Means, in which he calls attention to facts which demand the close scrutiny of Congress in regard to the restriction of future issues of tax-exempt securities, and also makes a definite announcement that it is the present policy of the Treasury not to issue its own obligations free from tax, calling attention to the fact that States and municipalities are continuing to issue securities in large volume, and that such States and municipalities are finding a ready sale for them under present conditions. Secretary Mellon states that continuing tax exemption constitutes an economic evil of the first magnitude.

Exemption from taxation of the income from securities has been arraigned at the bar of public opinion and has few advocates to defend it. It has been for many years an offender against economic law, social justice, and the American spirit of fair play. Public taxing officials and students of taxation throughout the country have protested against the creation of securities into which the rich can put their wealth and hold it immune from taxation, thus exempting themselves from their just and equitable share of the burdens of taxation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are we not doing that very thing when we come to the aid of the Federal Farm Loan Board in this proposal to enable the rich to invest in these farm-loan bonds, which are exempt from taxation?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes. This is a class of securities that is exempted.

Mr. STEVENSON. Was it not stated in the hearing before our committee that there were municipal bonds outstanding, tax free, amounting to $16,000,000,000, most of which were for the benefit of city dwellers, so that there is very little, comparatively, for the local benefit of country communities?

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I will say to the gentleman that the counties are not doing their duty to their local constituencies. They should be more alert to take care of their local improvements.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will treat with that a little further on.

Obviously that part of the burden which the wealthy owner of tax-exempt securities thus escapes must be borne by others. These others are those whose income does not come from investments of accumulated wealth, but from their daily wage and the profits on their business. Thus these tax-exempt securities furnish the machinery for transferring the great and increasing load of Federal, State, and local taxation from the shoulders of the wealthy—those best able to bear the brunt of the burden—to the shoulders of the "man in the street," the workers and doers of the country, whose enterprise and industry are thus penalized in favor of those who prefer to put their wealth into tax-free investments rather than to put it to work for the upbuilding of the country.

I have said that tax exemption is an evil of long standing. It is, but it has forced itself on public attention only in the last three or four years. In this brief space of time we have seen the personal wealth of the country so rapidly segregated into the tax-free class that whereas the taxable income of individual taxpayers under the Federal income tax law was $992,972,985 in 1916, the amount decreased to $731,372,053 in 1917 and to $392,247,329 in 1918. It is not to be supposed that the actual income of these taxpayers had thus decreased. It is a safe conclusion, on the contrary, that they had converted their wealth into tax-free securities so rapidly that at the same rate of conversion they would be "scot free' of all income tax by 1922. Indeed, if we accept an estimate that there are already issued and outstanding over $10,000,000,000 of securities totally exempt, we confront the outrageous possibility that all incomes exceeding $100,000 per annum from investments may be rendered totally immune from taxation. A more un-American condition of things can hardly be imagined. It is small wonder that the protest against any further issuance of tax-exempt securities is general and vehement, and coming from all parts of the country. Organizations of farmers, business men, bankers, tax experts, and officials have by resolution and otherwise emphasized this protest. Every group and interest in the Nation has been heard from with practically no dissenting voice, and the number is growing daily. There is no mistaking the predominant feeling that the income from all new issues of securities should be taxed, wherever held, and that not only the Federal Government, but State and local governments, should be placed in position to tax fairly and equitably the income from all securities.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT REQUIRED.

Unfortunately the remedy sought can not be had by immediately effective legislation. A great volume of new tax-exempt bonds is being issued by the States, counties, municipalities, and other political subdivisions of the country, and recent judicial opinions are to the effect that the income from such bonds can not be taxed by the Federal Government under the Federal Constitution as at present construed. While these bonds are thus barred from Federal tax, it is not strange, whatever the merits of their contention, that the beneficiaries of bonds rendered tax exempt by act of Congress should protest against the removal by legislation of their present privileges. On the other hand, their spokesmen have publicly stated that they were opposed in principle to tax exemption and would make no objection to the withdrawal of the privilege from their securities if all securities were rendered taxable.

Carried to a logical conclusion, this attitude, assumed by other groups who are asking for tax exemption by congressional action, would mean that we are facing the dilemma of either rendering all securities tax exempt or of taking "the bull by the horns" and calling for an amendment to the Constitution which will render all securities taxable. It is this latter solution that I propose in urging for passage House joint resolution 102.

STATE BENEFITS.

The passage of this resolution and the amendment which it proposes has been indorsed by the leading tax experts and practical tax officials of the country. Very little objection has been urged and that chiefly on the ground of State sovereignty. But this objection will be seen to have little weight when we realize the reciprocal advantages that would accrue to the States and local governments if they were enabled by this action as proposed to tax the income from Federal securities held by their citizens. At the present time the wealthiest citizens of every community are rendering themselves free of State, county, and municipal taxation on their personal wealth by investing in securities like the Federal farm-loan bonds and Government bonds, which are rendered immune from taxation by Federal legislation, and over which these States and local governments can have no control unless they accept the principle of the proposed amendment.

UMI

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman intend to discuss the moral aspects of a law now changing the nature of those bonds after they have been issued and sold?

Mr. McFADDEN. Any amendment that I may suggest here can not be retroactive, and a little further on I think I shall cover more particularly the point which the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. KING. Will it disturb the gentleman to yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KING. How would the gentleman control the situation with reference to the issue of foreign bonds sold in this country? Could they not be made tax exempt by the countries issuing them or the institutions in foreign countries issuing them? And would not that as a matter of fact aid the sale of all foreign securities in this country?

Mr. McFADDEN. It would have a serious effect on the sale of their securities. Now to proceed. And so it is that this amendment would be fully as much to the advantage of the State and local governments as to the Federal Government, for its advantages are reciprocal and its effect uniformly beneficial.

Now to proceed. And so it is that this amendment would be fully as much to the advantage of the State and local governments as to the Federal Government, for its advantages are reciprocal and its effect uniformly beneficial.

That this is recognized by the farsighted taxing officials of New York State is evidenced by their action at the tenth annual State tax conference held in Albany, March 2 and 3, in passing a resolution indorsing the passage of such an amendment in the following words:

We indorse the movement to obtain amendment of the United States Constitution in order to empower Congress to tax incomes from whatever source derived, such amendment probably being necessary in view of the amount of judicial dicta to that effect.

TOTAL VOLUME OF TAX EXEMPTS.

Mr. Otto H. Kahn estimated the amount of tax-exempt bonds which had been issued as of January, 1921, at a total of $14,425,000,000, made up of the following items:

Estimated amount of tax-exempt bonds in round figures.

1. Debts of States, cities, school districts, and other political subdivisions	$7,000,000,000
2. United States interest-bearing debt, issued prior to 1917	875,000,000
3. Debt, District of Columbia and United States possessions	50,000,000
4. Liberty 3½ per cent and Victory 3¾ per cent bonds (Victory bonds were issued as either 4¼ per cent taxable or 3¾ per cent tax-exempt bonds, the holders of the former having the unrestricted right to convert into the latter and vice versa)	5,400,000,000
5. Sundries, such as city and State revenue warrants issued and afloat and Federal farm loan bank bonds	600,000,000
6. Bonds of the second, third, and fourth Liberty loan issues, although generally taxable, are entirely tax exempt up to certain limited amounts in the hands of holders. This absolute tax exemption applies to amounts which may be as high as $130,000 bonds in the hands of any one holder. It is safe to figure that this aggregates an actual tax exemption of not less than	500,000,000
	14,425,000,000

BORROWERS' ADVANTAGES OVERESTIMATED.

Such opposition as there may be to the elimination of tax exemption arises, for the most part, from an exaggerated idea of its advantages to the borrower. With the bonds of the States and largest cities selling to yield the investor 5 to 6 per cent and of the towns and the counties to yield over 6 per cent, it is obvious that the saving in interest paid by the borrowing community is at most not over one-half of 1 per cent, and rarely that. To deny this is to regard the credit of the largest cities as inferior to that of the railways and large industrial corporations, whose underlying securities are selling to yield from 5½ to 6½ per cent and are fully taxable. The actual fact is that tax exemption has not so much the effect of broadening the market for and reducing the interest paid on tax-exempt securities as it has of segregating tax-exempt securities in the hands of the wealthy individual investor and of segregating taxable securities in the hands of nontaxpaying institutional investors and small individual holders who can not get any great advantage from tax exemption. In other words, tax exemption does not build up a larger market for securities or make for a lower rate, for the investment fund remains the same. Tax exemption simply tends to divide the investing public into two classes, one class being the wealthy individuals who buy tax-exempt bonds, and the other class being those to whom tax exemption means little or nothing, and who therefore buy taxable bonds.

HEAVY LOSS IN TAX REVENUE.

Offset against this trifling advantage to the borrower from tax exemption, moreover, there is a tremendous loss in taxes to this same borrower, whether the borrower be the Federal Government, a State, city, or county, or even a private citizen, for all such lose when tax revenue is lost and the tax burden shifted. And the loss in tax revenue by the issuance of tax-free securities is appalling.

To illustrate, it is stated that more than $1,000,000,000 of State and municipal tax-free securities were issued in 1920. If these securities have passed into the hands of the very wealthy, whose present Federal income tax is at the rate of 73 per cent, the total annual loss in this one form of tax alone is over $35,000,000, if the interest rate on these bonds averaged the low rate of 5 per cent. Granted that there may have been an apparent saving to the borrowers of one-half of 1 per cent per annum, this saving of a billion dollars of 5 per cent bonds is only $250,000 a year, or 0.711 per cent of the annual loss in taxes. Still worse, if the average term of these bonds is only 20 years and they continue to be held by these wealthy individuals and the rates of taxation are not reduced, the loss in Federal income tax alone would in that period be over $700,000,000, against a total saving in interest of only $5,000,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. I see it stated in the public press that it is the program of the Ways and Means Committee to reduce the surtaxes, and thereby cut down very materially the income taxes to be paid by these very rich people, people of very large incomes. About how would that affect this question?

Mr. McFADDEN. It would affect to some extent the question of tax exemption.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman know whether that is contemplated or not?

Mr. McFADDEN. Not being a member of that important committee, I can not say. It is evident that even if the bonds are held by investors, paying less than the maximum surtaxes, and even if the surtaxes be substantially reduced, no such reduction would overcome this preposterous discrepancy, which should be sufficient in itself to show the absurdity of the argument that there is any "advantage" in tax exemption which the State and local governments are called upon to give up under the proposed amendment.

On the other hand, in addition to this loss to the community at large, through the loss of Federal revenue, the States and local governments are losing heavily through their inability to tax their own citizens who hold tax-exempt Federal obligations, the potential volume of which under the Federal farm loan act alone may well run into several billions of dollars. The aggregate of tax-exempt Federal "instrumentality" securities, made possible under the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Farm Loan case, has been estimated by one statistician at enough billions to absorb the entire taxable investment fund of the country. Obviously, since these Federal "instrumentality" securities are exempt from all State, county, city, and local taxation, they will be in greater demand than State, county, and municipal bonds, and will have the twofold effect of supplanting the latter in the market and of depriving the States and local governments of all power to tax the investment holdings of their citizens.

It must be self-evident that it will be to the very great advantage of the States, therefore, to take advantage of the opportunity which this amendment will afford to forever put an end to this menace to their sovereignty and financial solvency.

INDUSTRIAL AND BUILDING PROGRESS RETARDED.

The arguments I have voiced against tax exemption would seem to be enough to condemn it, but even so I have omitted many counts in the indictment.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the diversion of the funds of wealthy estates and individuals from real estate mortgages to tax-exempt bonds has seriously handicapped the entire building program and industry of the country. The resulting situation is acute, especially in housing—largely because of tax exemption.

The railways and public utilities, accustomed to look to the wealthy investor for leadership in meeting their needs for funds, have had to go afield and establish new channels, not yet adequate to their needs.

Above all things, in this time of reconstruction and recovery from the warping effect of war, we need the influence of new enterprise and the initiative of the Nation's men of means and proved business capacity. But what is there in the way of new business enterprise that can tempt a wealthy investor when he can get as much net return from a 5 per cent tax-exempt bond as from a taxable investment paying over 17 per cent? The springs of recuperative effort in the country are dried up by such a situation, but we can not remedy it by eliminating all graduated levies under the income tax. We can remedy it only by removing the tax-exempt bond from the market, putting all investments on an equal plane, thus tempting the wealthy and able business men of the country to put their capital to the best and most productive use.

GOVERNMENT WAR BONDS DEPRESSED.

Another charge against tax exemption is by itself, it seems to me, more than enough to eliminate it from our fiscal policies. The depreciation in the market of the great war issues of Liberty and Victory bonds, with losses to the millions of patriotic citizens who subscribed for them running as high as 15 per cent of the principal invested, where the bonds are liquidated, can not be contemplated with anything but shame and dismay, and it outrages all sense of justice and fair play for the Federal Government and the States and cities to sponsor issues of totally tax-free securities in competition with these Liberty bonds, thus contributing to their depression in the market and adding insult to injury to the people of the country.

PROPERTY CONFISCATION.

The power to tax is limited only by the power to confiscate property. Both the interest and principal of the large volumes of bonds which have been issued free from income taxation must be paid from tax revenue, a large share of which will have to be derived from a property tax. As the bond burden increases so will the property-tax burden increase, until the productive capacity of the property to sustain the tax has been reached, when the owner will be forced to forfeit the property to the political unit or units imposing the tax. The tax-exempt securities issued by the Government, State, or other political subdivision, because of the ease in obtaining funds, encourages public debt, public extravagance, and inefficiency in the expenditure of the funds so raised.

IMPAIRMENT OF NATIONAL AND STATE CREDIT.

As the indebtedness of State, county, city, or other political subdivision of the State, either separately or in the aggregate, approaches the point of tax confiscation the credit position of the State becomes greatly impaired through the curtailment of earned revenue and arrested development of revenue-producing resources. Normally the credit position of the Government is superior to that of the State and the State to that of the city. The financial stability of the Nation depends upon the maintenance of this normal relation. I hold that the impairment of the credit position of a city, county, or other political subdivision impairs the credit position of the State of which they are organic parts and that the credit position of a State can not become impaired without also impairing the credit position of the Nation.

The State has no power to limit municipalities and counties in the creation of debt, and consequently the tax burden incidental thereto is unlimited. To amend the constitution offers the only solution to the States in protecting their credit from the evils of tax-exempt securities. The Government in turn has no power to limit the States in the creation of debts, and consequently the tax burden incidental thereto is unlimited. This amendment, providing for the reciprocal taxation of Government, State, and municipal securities, offers the only means of protecting the Government's credit position, as well as that of all other political subdivisions, from the hardships of tax exemption.

From this analysis the deduction follows that the issuance of tax-exempt securities by the Government and political subdivisions thereof is rapidly tending toward property confiscation and the impairment of the Nation's credit and violates thereby the principles of the Constitution, designed primarily to protect property rights and insure the credit stability of the Nation. The framers of the Constitution could not have anticipated this condition which now so seriously menaces the financial security and industrial prosperity of the Nation no less than that of each of the States. [Applause.]

Will the gentleman from Arkansas use some of his time?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman promised to yield some time to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO], did he not?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes. I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WINGO. And I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak to-day on what I consider the most vital problem confronting not only the American people but the world—agriculture.

The American farmer produced his last crops under the most expensive conditions and at the greatest cost, but has been obliged to dispose of them at deflated prices and has sustained to date a loss of about $7,000,000,000.

It was the sudden drop in the price of agricultural products below the cost of production that started the paralysis in business, and until we again place agriculture on a normal foundation employment and prosperity will not come back. I propose to discuss during my time some of the factors that we must consider in connection with this important problem.

Mr. Chairman, it is indeed strange that in a country like ours, which is fundamentally agricultural, that there should be so much misunderstanding between Representatives on this floor. For instance, a few weeks ago, during the debate on the farmers' emergency tariff bill, when Members representing agricultural sections were asking for protection for agricultural products in proportion to the protection accorded to manufactured products, we were charged by Mr. WALSH, of Massachusetts, with being sectional and with advocating class legislation. He said that he for one did not propose to stand for it, when 40 factories were idle in the district which he represents.

Mr. REAVIS, of Nebraska, reminded him of the fact that his factories were idle and his people unemployed because the agricultural products of the farmers were selling below the cost of production and their purchasing power was destroyed.

It was very evident during that debate that party lines were not as rigid as they used to be. For instance, we saw able Democratic leaders standing upon this floor asking for the same protection in proportion for agricultural products as that given to manufactured products. We saw old Republican protectionists, like Mr. LUCE, of Massachusetts, oppose protection for agricultural products. That was not strange, because for years those belonging to his school were taught that protection was for manufactured products only. And we of the South permitted our products to go on the free list, with the result that we sold what we produced on a free market and bought what we needed on a protected market. This is not strange, either, when we take into consideration the fact that the manufacturers have been organized in the past, while the farmers were not organized.

During the hearings on the tariff bill we had a remarkable exhibition. A soap manufacturer appeared before the committee to oppose a tariff on oil and advocate a tariff on soap. When pressed by the committee he admitted that he wanted to buy foreign oil cheap to make soap to sell in America. Some one remarked, jokingly, that if he got his just dues his soap would be placed on the free list and oil on the protected list.

I mention these cases merely to show how unfair it is to consider such big questions in a sectional way, and how necessary it is for us to understand one another if we are to solve such questions in the right way.

The last war has demonstrated to all the necessity of our country having its own vital industries at home and of not depending on foreign countries in time of emergency. For instance, our cotton producers of the South lost millions of dollars in the beginning of the war because we had no merchant marine of our own to carry our surplus cotton to the markets of the world.

The last war has also demonstrated another fact, and that is that the tariff can no longer be considered a partisan question. It is an economic question.

When we go to the customhouse to collect a tariff, it makes no difference whether we do so under a tariff for protection or a tariff for revenue, the fact remains that it is an advantage to the American over his foreign competitor, and these advantages, or tariffs, should be given to agricultural products in proportion as they are given to the manufactured products. This Nation can not prosper as a whole and permanently half protected and half free. Our farmers can no longer compete with those of foreign countries—for instance, in Asia, where they wear very little clothing and live on practically nothing—without sinking to their level or go broke.

And, gentlemen of the House, our farmers are wide-awake to this situation. To prove that they realize what they are up against, I want to quote a statement from the National Grange Monthly of this month:

During the war the shortage in the world supply of animal fats caused a tremendous demand for vegetable fats, not only in other countries actually at war but in the United States, which was supplying those countries with a large part of their food products. One of the future effects of the war which seriously concerns farmers of the United States, especially those engaged in the production of cotton, peanuts, and other oil-producing cereals and the dairy and swine industry, which are the chief producers of animal fats, is the accumulation of large imports of cheap vegetable oils. This matter is one of recent development, and has never been sufficiently important to require careful attention in the tariff. But it now has reached proportions which seriously alarm all of these American interests. A reaction of this is found in the emergency tariff bill. This schedule was hastily prepared, and an investigation seems to indicate that these figures are not sufficiently high to give the necessary protection to either producers of cottonseed oil or peanut oil.

I have heard some say that the cotton growers get no protection from a tariff. Aside from the protection he gets on long staple in the emergency tariff bill, every cotton grower who sells a bale of short-staple cotton weighing 500 pounds has 1,000 pounds of cotton seed to sell; and certainly protection of cottonseed oil against vegetable oil from Asia means a higher price for his cotton seed.

President Monroe, whose name has been mentioned so often lately in connection with the Monroe doctrine, said:

Our manufactures require the systematic and fostering care of the Government. Equally important is it to provide for our raw material.

Then, too, when we were considering the rural credit bill, with the view of encouraging our people to own their homes, we heard some of the eastern bankers predict that such legislation as that would ruin the country. Again, recently when we were advocating legislation for good roads we heard representatives say that we were asking too much money from the Government; that they were in favor of economy when we know that there can be no economy when this important link of transportation is not cared for.

I repeat, I mention those well-known instances to remind Members that these wide differences of opinion indicate a misunderstanding between representatives of the different sections of our country.

I do not believe that this feeling should continue to exist in the consideration of measures which are absolutely national in character. The farmers are not asking for unreasonable legislation. A man who runs a farm is a capitalist, an employer, a laborer, a producer, and a consumer. Farmers include all classes, and they have sympathetic ties with all classes, and they are naturally conservative. Every student of history knows that in every crisis, when there is unrest and danger of revolution in the big centers, it is to the country that we look for calm and safety. It is wrong for Representatives to stand upon this floor and charge us with advocating class legislation.

Agriculture is the foundation upon which all other industries are based. It produces the cotton and wool to clothe the world, the meat and bread to feed all the people. Going and coming, it provides the bulk of transportation. Farm production has been the chief factor in our foreign trade and for paying our debts abroad. Farmers are the buyers of a larger percentage of American manufactured goods than any other class. Gentlemen of the House, if there is any legislation which is national in character, which is for the benefit of the whole American people, without special preference or special aid or special benefit to any, it is that which promotes agricultural conditions.

George Washington, the Father of Our Country, impressed upon our people the necessity of developing agriculture as a foundation for our future development and prosperity.

President Harding, in an address delivered recently, said:

We will do well to keep in mind at this time the fundamental importance of agriculture, and in every possible way insure justice to it. We are confronted by the need to place our own house in order, and no more important feature of that effort can be visioned than to place our agricultural industry on a sound basis and provide machinery and facilities for financing and distributing crops. If we do this, we merely will be providing the farmer with facilities similar to those enjoyed by the business communities generally.

Let me call your attention, especially you Members from the manufacturing centers and large cities of the country, to what happened in Europe following the World War. When Austria-Hungary was dismembered, the agricultural part was taken away from what is now Austria. In other words, that nation was left like a stomach without arms, head, or legs—a consumer unable to produce; a population that was wholly urban. Without agriculture their manufacturing industries ceased to operate; there was no commerce and no employment, and soon the representatives of that country, once great and prosperous, were compelled to go on bended knees to the Allies and admit that they could no longer maintain themselves as a country, and ask that they be taken charge of and governed from outside. In the Washington Post of June 20 there appeared a communication from Vienna, by Col. House, in which he stated that some 400,000 children in Austria were being fed by the American Relief Association.

The last census shows an increasing number of vacant farms with an increasing number of population in the large cities. And I say to you here and now that if this condition is not remedied in the near future, it will not be long before serious trouble will happen in the congested centers. We often hear Members advocate drastic laws to curb bolshevism, but, my friends, the surest protection against bolshevism is employment and production. Show me a man who is employed and whose family has the comforts of home and I will show you a family who will not fall for the preaching of the bolshevist, the communist, or the anarchist. If it had not been for the wonderful progress made in developing labor-saving farming machinery, the farm problem would have been even more acute than it is to-day. Fully 50 per cent of all the immigrants entering this country during the past 10 years or more had been engaged in agricultural pursuits in their former home lands. But not 10 per cent of them settled on farms in the United States.

Now, let us consider for a moment what we are asking for. First, markets must be found for America's surplus products. The domestic demand will not suffice. We ask that America's vast money resources be properly placed. Deflation has been too severe and has gone too far in the agricultural regions of this country. There must be modifications of the restrictions which a year ago nearly put us out of business, so that money from the Federal reserve banks and the rural credit banks can be loaned more freely in the agricultural sections on longer terms and at a lower rate of interest. In other words, there must be a recognition of the difference between an agricultural paper and a commercial paper, because the agricultural paper is based upon a transaction which requires more time than the ordinary commercial paper. Then, too, the Government must work in harmony with the international bankers with the view of encouraging the corporations and agencies formed to foster the export trade of the United States. These foreign export concerns, organized under the Edge law, have not been as successful as they should have been thus far, through want of sufficient capital.

Then, too, when foreigners come to America to borrow from our bankers they should be met with the suggestion that the money they borrow from the American people be spent in the United States. If they borrow American money with which to buy, they ought to buy from American producers instead of taking the American gold in their purses and going shopping elsewhere, as was done in the case of one foreign loan recently negotiated in this country, in which a part of the money was spent in Argentina for wheat. It was explained in that case that this money afterwards came back to the United States to pay for manufactured goods bought by South America. We want the benefit of American loans to be more direct to the producers and manufacturers of our country. I believe that if we would take a firm position on this proposition the foreign Governments would soon recognize the fairness of our view and be governed by it, because then they would find better cooperation on the part of our Government and the financial interests of the country. Why, the other day our attention was called to a case which I want to tell you of. The Panama Railway Co. advertised for 300,000 pounds of rice in New Orleans. They wanted 150,000 pounds from Siam and 150,000 from China. Imagine this situation: There was the Government buying Asiatic rice in the heart of the rice section, where warehouses are filled with the very best rice produced in the world and selling for almost nothing. We immediately took the matter up with Mr. Hoover, who, in turn, took it up with the War Department, and we were assured that this practice would be stopped at once. We could not ask foreigners who borrow from us to spend their money here if we allow the Government to buy products abroad when they can be bought here from our people below the cost of production.

Our exports for the month of April, 1921, were $339,914,987. For April, 1920, they amounted to $684,319,392, or a loss for this one month of $344,404,405, or more than 50 per cent. This can not go on indefinitely. With the domestic market stagnant and foreign trade losing ground so rapidly, it is obviously the duty of the Federal Government, in the interest of all the people, to use its influence to stimulate business and turn the tide in favor of the American people. The interests of no single class or section are involved here, but the interests of all the people.

I want to be well understood in this connection. I am not advocating that the Government make more loans to foreign Governments. On the contrary, I believe that those countries who owe us and who are increasing their navies and armies at this very time should be made to at least pay us the interest on what they owe us, which, I understand, amounts to a million dollars a day.

I believe that the War Finance Corporation, which we were compelled to revive under fire, should be made to function to its full capacity, with due regard, of course, to security.

Second. Another question of vital interest to our people at this time and which must be solved soon is the question of transportation.

A few days ago we had a delegation of representative farmers here before the Interstate Commerce Commission. These men proved beyond doubt that some of our perishable products were rotting on the farm because shipments that had been made did not pay the cost of transportation. Pause and think of it. Here are consumers in the big centers paying exorbitant prices for products that are rotting on the farm because products will not pay the cost of transportation, let alone a profit to the people who produce them. Not only is it a loss to the producers and consumers, but it is a loss to the railroads.

But, my friends, let us be practical in the consideration of this vital question. Of course, we must have fair and competent Government regulations with economy, and we must demand an immediate reduction in freight rates; but at the same time let us understand that this would only give us temporary relief, and if we are to have permanent relief we must build up a comprehensive and efficient system of transportation. And we can not consider transportation in a comprehensive way without considering good roads and waterways in connection with railroads. And then, too, we must have our own merchant ships on the seaboard to carry our surplus products to foreign markets.

Under the policy of private interests that controlled railroads in the past there was built up a system of transportation which tended to move all the freight in one direction—to the few favored destinations. The system was like a huge bottle with a small neck, all of the lines converging to a narrow strip of coast line in the northeastern part of the country. Trunk lines were parallel to the northeast, because traffic was forced in that direction. Other outlets—river and rail—were largely neglected. The result of this policy was that when the pressing demand of war industry came there was a congestion and paralysis of transportation because our railroads were unable to deliver the goods through the neck of the bottle. Under a comprehensive system of transportation, including our good roads, waterways, and a merchant marine of our own, we could make use of more ports on our seaboard, which would not only give more efficient service but would lower our cost of transportation.

We are an exporting Nation. We send our surplus products to foreign markets, and when our wheat or cotton or rice reaches the foreign markets the prices are fixed on the other side by the competition which they meet there. Now, if we can lower the cost of transportation, it follows that our producers will get more for their products.

Transportation is a part of production and a charge upon it. We have not actually finished anything until we have placed it into the hands of the consumer.

No country on earth has been more favored by Providence with such a magnificent system of navigable waterways than ours, but we can not claim credit because of what nature has done for us. It is only in the manner in which we are conserving and developing our resources that we confer distinction upon our citizenship and fix our place among the nations. In Belgium and Holland the ocean is brought to their cities, and it is a well-known fact that those countries are world powers in commerce and manufacture.

In the strategy of trade our competitors have wisely acted upon the principle well known to physics, that it is easier to move a body floating in a liquid than to carry it on wheels. As an illustration of this statement I want to call your attention to a shipment of rice that is being made from my district at this time. The Lake Charles Rice Milling Co. is shipping 12,240 pockets of rice through the intercoastal canal by barges to Orange, Tex., to connect with a steamer sailing direct to Hamburg, Germany. Now, the rail rates from Lake Charles, La., to Orange, Tex., is 25½ cents per 100 pounds, whereas the barge rates by water is only 10 cents. It should be plain to any thinking man that if we are to sell rice in Germany in competition with foreign rice, we must make the efforts to reduce freight rates. And here is an example of what the waterways can do for a community. And then, too, this is a permanent relief.

Let us hope that the bill appropriating money for Federal aid in the building of good roads will pass before the end of this session. We must not consider the pleasure only that we get out of good roads, but we must think of the future of the motor truck in transportation. We well remember how the motor trucks from the farms saved New York during the last railroad strike there. I never appreciated the real value of good roads until I visited Europe. There is one lesson we should learn from France, especially in connection with good roads, and it is the importance of setting aside a fund for proper maintenance after we have built good roads.

Every time we ask for appropriations for the improvement of our waterways and good roads, we are invariably met with the cry of extravagance and we are told that we must practice economy. It is false economy to refuse appropriations for such worthy improvements. What we should do, if we wish to practice real economy, is to see that the money which is appropriated for these projects, and other projects as well, is spent economically and where it is really needed. And the only way to practice such economy is to adopt a policy and follow it instead of appropriating in a piecemeal way.

Our terminal facilities must be improved too, because we will never have the full use of our waterways until provision is made for loading and unloading and storage.

Our marketing facilities must also be improved. Our whole system of wholesaling and retailing is inefficient and uneconomical. A recent investigation, conducted by the Government, showed these defects. I heard it said at a conference of farmers, merchants, and bankers in New York the other day that the producers of America receive about one-fourth of the price paid by the consumers as compared with that which the producers of Holland receive, due mainly to the difference between the systems of transportation, marketing, and distribution.

The farmers of this country are beginning to understand that organization and cooperation in a business way is necessary to bring about a betterment of these conditions. That is why we are asking that their organizations be authorized by Federal law and accountable to the Department of Agriculture. That is why, too, they asked for a committee to investigate agricultural conditions and report back to Congress.

The consumers as well as the producers should welcome the development of a marketing system, operated and controlled by the men who naturally produce the products. This may look like a dream to those who have become used to the speculating and gambling method of marketing that has been developed in this country, but it is not a dream. It is possible that brains, patience, and organization can bring to full success such a system. Until the gap standing between the producers and consumers of this country is crossed and the unfair middlemen are eliminated, there must, of necessity, remain misunderstanding and bad feeling between the people living in the big centers and the producers of the country. It is impossible for a consumer who lives in a big city and who has not the opportunity to go to a farm to understand the situation. He blames, of course, the farmer for the high cost of living, instead of cooperating with the farmer to eliminate the unfair and useless middleman. He does not know that the cooked apple for which he pays 20 cents only brings one-third of a cent to the apple grower; that the glass of milk that he pays 10 cents for only brings 1 cent to the farmer who raises and milks the cow; that the eggs which cost him 90 cents a dozen can be bought for 20 or 25 cents a dozen in the country. He is charged 75 cents for a mutton chop, when the statement was made on the floor of the House the other day that in the city of El Paso sheep had netted only 25 cents a head to the sheep raiser. He is charged $10 for a pair of ordinary shoes, when the cattleman is unable to sell his hides at any price.

Gentlemen of the House, if these defects in our system of transportation, distribution, and marketing are not corrected, what will happen? The farmers will not farm and raise for pleasure; they will cut down production, and reduced production will certainly mean suffering and higher prices to the consumers in the end.

Let me quote from an Associated Press dispatch dated Chicago, June 19:

> The number of cattle for each 100 persons in the United States is to-day one-third less than in 1900. The sheep supply is reduced nearly two-thirds; while the number of hogs is below 44 per cent less now than then, according to figures compiled from the Federal census reports by Herbert Myrick. The decline during recent months in prices to producers constitutes the gravest economical crime ever perpetrated on the farmers of America.

Another factor which is of vital importance to our farmers is storage facilities. I hope to see the day come when every part of the country will have its United States bonded warehouses. The warehouse law was passed in 1916, to establish a form of warehouse receipts for cotton, grain, wool, and tobacco, which will make these receipts easily and widely negotiable as delivery orders or as collateral for loans, and therefore a definite assistance in financing crops. Thus our agricultural products would be weighed and graded by licensed weighers and graders who would be neither buyers nor sellers and our products sampled but once. The statement of weight and grade is perhaps the most important feature to depositors of agricultural products. It gives the receipt the utmost value as collateral, because it furnishes the bankers with a basis for valuation. It also eliminates the loss from weather damage. We also save 25 per cent on fire insurance when our products are in bonded warehouses. It would eliminate the present practice of peddling our products and protect us from the gamblers.

I believe, too, that we should be more liberal with our agricultural institutions, so that more of our young men who intend to farm can learn the value of practical and scientific agriculture, so as to produce more economically, and understand better that farming does not end with production only, but with distribution and marketing. And that they may learn, also, the value of diversification, because diversification is absolutely necessary if the farmers are to operate on a cash basis.

In conclusion, gentlemen of the House, I want to appeal to the Members here who represent manufacturing districts to give this big question of agriculture more time and study and help us eliminate this wide gap now existing between the producers and the consumers, so that in the end we of the agricultural section can get a fair and living price for what we produce and you will pay a more reasonable price for what you consume. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman from Alabama use some of his time?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the House attempts to furnish to the agricultural interests of the country greater financial credit. There can be no question but that the agricultural interests of the country are in a state of depression entirely unjustified by conditions and more severe than ever before in the history of our country. I have the honor to represent one of the greatest agricultural sections of the State of Virginia, if not as great as any in the Union. The great counties in the Shenandoah Valley and some of the richest portions of Piedmont, Va., constitute the district, and from every source I receive but the one story of the financial depression in which the agricultural interests are now involved. The fertility of the soil, the sturdy, industrious character of the people, and reasonably fair seasons should have brought to the people of that section a rich reward for their labor. As a matter of fact, however, many losses have been entailed by falling prices, and instead of increased prosperity the farmers find themselves confronted with financial disaster. The more bountifully the earth has responded to cultivation the greater has been the losses inflicted. Nor is there proper correspondence between the prices on farm produce to the producer and the price of such produce to the consumer. In the great industrial centers the toilers in other lines of activity are still confronted with the high cost of living. The price to the farmer is below the cost of production and the price in the city is beyond the reach of the consumer. This is not the normal condition, and it is the duty of Congress to afford the necessary relief. There are several conditions which conspire to bring this result:

First. The farmer at a critical moment was denied the credit to which he was entitled, and which was so essential for the proper marketing of his crop.

For some unknown reason at the moment when an extension of credit was the most necessary the Federal reserve banks entered upon their system of deflation. This found the farmer involved in the expense of production without the means of properly financing the marketing of his crops. It became necessary for him to rush his produce to market and accept such prices as might then be offered. The result has been a great depreciation in the value of his farm products. Speculators have apparently obtained control of the market and the farmer has been made to suffer. The present bill is an effort to remedy this manifest injustice to the agricultural interests. It, however, is on a very meager scale. Much more extensive relief could be furnished by the Federal reserve banks expanding the currency to meet the proper demands of the agricultural interests. I hope at some future date to get before the House a measure along this line. The present bill is a step in the right direction. It does not give as large a credit as might be well given in this method. The original bill called for a deposit of $50,000,000 with the farm loan banks, and in this shape it passed the Senate, but the House committee has amended the bill so that this deposit is reduced to twenty-five millions. It is true that being a revolving fund the credit is much greater than the amount deposited. Constituting a revolving fund, the $25,000,000 as soon as it is exhausted can be replaced by the proceeds of the sales of the farm bonds in which it has been invested. At the same time it is not, in my opinion, a sufficiently adequate sum to meet the demands of the agricultural interests. Besides, the methods of loaning through farm banks offer advantages to those who desire long-time credit in the purchase of real estate or in its development, but are very cumbersome to those who desire short-time credit for the purpose of the proper harvesting of their produce.

It is a step in the right direction. It is an assistance in a meager way, but in my judgment it should be accompanied by other bills requiring the Federal reserve system to expand the currency to meet the present requirements of agriculture. One of the great purposes of the Federal reserve bank was to afford a ready and conservative expansion of currency in times of financial stress, and it was exceedingly unfortunate that deflation should have been brought about when the agricultural interests so urgently demanded extension of credit. One of the faults of the old currency system which the Federal reserve banking system was intended to supersede was contraction of currency, so as to reduce credit at times when contraction meant disaster to legitimate business. It was one of the heralded advantages of the Federal reserve system that it could always be relied upon to expand when the necessities of trade demanded expansion and to contract when those demands had been met. To create enormous reserves at the time of depression is to pervert the most useful feature of the Federal reserve system. The gold in this country has increased, according to estimates, nearly a billion dollars and the currency has been enormously deflated when the increased gold reserve fully warranted a great expansion. The increase of gold gave the reserve banks the base upon which to build an expanded currency. Under the terms of the Federal reserve banking system the currency could have been safely expanded with the increase of the gold brought into reserve. Instead of increasing, however, although the basis for credit had thus wonderfully been increased, the Federal reserve banks deflated at a time when such action worked the greatest possible hardship to the farming interests. I do not know who was responsible for this deflation, but whoever it was followed a course which meant the loss in millions to the farming interests and which was wholly unnecessary from a sound banking standpoint. I believe that this measure which is now before the House should be supplemented by further legislation to expand the currency to meet the demands of agriculture and other great financial interests. I do not understand why the majority party in this Congress, in bringing this bill before the House, has thought proper to reduce the benefit to be derived from the measure by cutting in half the amount of deposit originally proposed and deemed necessary by the Farm Loan Board and sanctioned by the Senate.

Second. Another source of great loss to the agricultural interests has been the excessive freight rates charged by the railroad systems of the country. The freight rates have almost been prohibitive, and, in my judgment, have been wholly unwarranted, considered either from the shipper's standpoint or the carrier's standpoint. The amount deducted from the market price at the seaport to meet transportation charges at the inland town depot has quadrupled on grain and other farm products. In days gone by the farmer of the Shenandoah Valley would deduct from the market price paid in Baltimore 4 or 5 cents per bushel of wheat to cover transportation charges. He must now deduct 25 or 30 cents. The Interstate Commerce Commission has sanctioned these excessive charges, notwithstanding the liberal provisions made for the railroads in the Esch-Cummins bill. In the shipment of fruit notably to certain points of consumption the freight rates have been increased to that extent that such shipments can no longer be profitably made. The railroads claim they are losing money, but if they make their rates so oppressive that shippers can not utilize their facilities it is no wonder they are losing money. But if they are losing money, it is because of very bad management somewhere. It seems to me the Interstate Commerce Commission should feel it incumbent to make necessary investigation to discover where the trouble lies and to correct it. If the railroads are not making expenses for their stockholders at the present rate of charges, then it is very evident that they have ceased under private management to respond to public demand.

Some relief might be given by repealing all taxes on transportation of farm products.

In this connection I take the opportunity of urging upon Congress the propriety of making liberal appropriations to develop the parcel post and to stimulate road construction. In recent years transportation has been greatly facilitated by the motor vehicles. This form of transportation can be greatly facilitated by the construction of good roads. Wherever the road has been improved there we find the truck transporting goods or passengers in relief of the congestion in railroad transportation. The various States of the Union have been aroused to the utility of good roads. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been appropriated by the several States for road construction. It is very poor policy on the part of Congress to practice economy in appropriations for the development of the country. Appropriations have run into a billion for armaments of all kinds, but when it comes to the peaceful development of the country in lines of industry Congress uses unmercifully the pruning hook. It is very evident that the difficulties in the way of the farmer in transportation enables the middleman to make an unmerciful profit by depressing the price to the farmer and increasing the price to the city consumer.

Third, the great market for farm staples is the foreign market. The domestic market is always glutted. We produce in this country farm products far more than the people consume. In order to secure proper prices it is necessary to open the markets of the world to our products. Anything which interferes with foreign trade will inevitably depress the prices of farm products. Europe is in a state of financial chaos. All the great European countries are virtually bankrupt. They have not the gold to stabilize their currency. The result has been that the rate of exchange has been a great barrier to trade with this country. England, perhaps the most prosperous of any of the foreign countries, suffers in common with the others.

The English pound, which in normal times is worth $5 of our money, has shrunk to a little over $3. An Englishman, therefore, buying produce from this country must pay the rate of exchange. Where in former years a pound would buy $5 worth of our produce, it now buys but little more than $3 worth of our produce, and this loss must naturally be borne by the Englishman or it is reflected in the depressed price of our grain. As these countries can not, therefore, buy our produce with their money, it is necessary for them to buy our produce with their goods, and so it seems to me the tariff law will prove an enormous burden to our agricultural interests. By interfering with the exchange of foreign goods for our farm products we are necessarily to that extent closing foreign markets to our farmers. Of course, it is necessary to lay tariff taxes, but when these tariff taxes are made protective to such an extent as to forbid the importation of foreign goods into this country we are taking away from the foreign consumer the only means he has with which to buy our produce. As the conditions in Europe are much disturbed and factories can not for a long time be reestablished upon a scale sufficiently large to seriously affect our domestic market, it does seem to me that these tariff taxes could be made sufficiently light so as not to impair exchange for our farm products and greatly increase the Government's revenue.

A tariff tax on farm products is more or less ridiculous. The emergency tariff, so called, has been in force for some time, and yet each day's reports show a steady decline in the grain markets and other markets supposed to be protected by the tariff.

What the farmer demands is not laws forbidding importations, but laws facilitating exportations of his produce to a world eager to obtain it.

The millions of hungry peoples of Europe long for the opportunity to take the produce of our farms. They are eager for the opportunity to buy at fair and reasonable prices. They have, however, no gold, and can only offer their own commodities in fair exchange. What folly to interpose between a traffic so profitable to the farmers of this country and to the toilers of foreign lands prohibitive tariffs which make fair trade impossible and reduce the revenue of the Government. It reduces the revenue because the tax reduces importations excessively.

The protective tariff on farm products is keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope; while prohibitive tariffs on commodities of exchange for farm productions are denying the farmers the world market for their produce.

In so far as the present bill furnishes some extension of credit to the farmer, I shall vote for it, and hope further relief may be extended. I do not fear that the tax-exemption features of farm loan bonds will ever create tax-exempt securities to such an extent as will be an evil. On the contrary, this feature makes the farm loan bonds a most attractive investment, and will create the proper capital for loan to the farmers.

The present condition of the agricultural interests demands the prompt acceptance of all measures of relief, however meager, which can be obtained from Congress, and I shall gladly vote for the pending bill. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I intend to support the pending measure. This bill amends section 32 of the farm loan act and assures the continued active functioning of the farm-loan system. The farm-loan system comes out of the nonpartisan thinking and activities of men who long ago realized that agriculture stood in need of some system which would furnish it with long-term credit with reasonable rates of interest and on the amortization plan of repayment of principal. This the system is doing. Even now, since the Supreme Court's decision in February upholding the constitutionality of the act, $40,000,000 are being loaned to the farmers through it. This sum will run the system until about August 1, when, unless this bill is passed, loanable funds will not be available until such time as farm-loan bonds may be sold to the public to produce such funds. The present bond offering of $40,000,000 is not even now entirely closed, although it was begun April 18. This indicates not only the difficulties of the present bond market but likewise the unwisdom of attempting in the immediate future to float another issue of this same character of bonds. It could not be done. The enactment of this bill will provide loanable funds until early autumn, when it is expected a successful flotation of bonds can be made.

It may surprise some that I, who live in a great city teeming with industry and business, should feel a very definite interest in this matter, which on the face of it seems to affect only agriculture. My interest in this measure comes out of a realization of the fact that the streets of my great city would soon grow up in grass were it not for the activities upon the farms of the country. It is about time that the man of the city should begin to understand that there is not a problem touching agriculture which is not of vital interest to him. The farm produces two of the absolute necessities of life and civilization—food and clothing—and those of us of the cities who must eat and be clothed must know once and for all that we are dependent directly upon the farm for these necessities, and that every measure of help to agriculture is in fact only helping ourselves. The present census figures present a picture which, while not alarming especially, must give reason for the promotion of every enterprise which will make farm life more profitable and rural conditions more inviting.

Mr. WYANT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WYANT. I understand this bill is to afford the farmers some relief in this time of distress. In the gentleman's district and in my district 75 per cent of the miners and the millmen are out of employment and are in distress. They own their little homes. Would it be possible to enact legislation to afford these people in our districts the necessary relief, and would the gentleman be in favor of such a measure?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. I hope it is possible, and I am ready to support any measure to that end. I may say that the industrial conditions to-day are different from what they have been in many decades. I am hopeful, however, and I am sure that these conditions will be readjusted, and that labor will be employed. For the first time in our history urban population is greater than rural population. The increase in percentage of urban population during the past decade is many times greater than a like percentage of increase in rural population. We have reached the point where there are more mouths to be fed than there are people in the country at work to feed them. Any legislation, therefore, which looks to the betterment of agriculture throughout the Nation should appeal strongly not only to Members representing agricultural districts, but to those of us who represent city districts, because we are just as much dependent upon agriculture as is the farmer himself. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I am supporting this bill upon the theory suggested a moment ago by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD]. I am going to take half a loaf because I can not get a whole loaf. Some of us have been fighting for several weeks to make it a whole loaf, but there is an influence here somewhere that no one can see—I will not characterize it as "invisible Government"—that has made it difficult for those of us who are favorable to this legislation to make headway in securing its passage. This influence is such that Republicans just coming into power, fresh from their unprecedented victory, with every opportunity for public service confronting them, seem unable to keep their hands on themselves. For six years I have had the honor of serving as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. During this time much important legislation has been framed by this committee and passed by the House. We have considered and passed upon measures of vast importance to the financial affairs of this country and the world.

During this time the members of the committee have been accustomed to meet in the usual way, and after free and full discussion, make its decisions and have measures reported to the House accordingly. It has been the custom for all members of the committee, whether members of the majority party or minority party, to be taken into the full confidence of all other members of the committee. The first exception to this rule, so far as I know, is to be found in the history of the bill before us to-day. For weeks the Banking and Currency Committee held hearings on legislation to give aid to the land banks. Some of us favored authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make deposits to the extent of $100,000,000. Some were opposed to any aid at all. But, a majority of the committee decided that the most practical thing to do was to pass the bill carrying $50,000,000, which had already passed the Senate. The bill before us provides for only $25,000,000. It is not the bill favored by the members of the Banking and Currency Committee who really desire the extension of Government aid to enable the land banks to meet the needs of the farmers of the country. It was framed in conference by some members of the committee, most of whom voted against reporting the Senate bill and who are not really in sympathy with the original farm loan act, assisted by others in conference who were not members of the Banking and Currency Committee. The bill was thus drawn up, presented, and rushed through the Banking and Currency Committee as a substitute for the Senate bill, which the committee had almost two weeks previously ordered reported to the House. The rules of the House will not permit me to review all that transpired in the committee, but it would be interesting to Members to know just what occurred, and I think it would be interesting to the farmers of the country to know the facts regarding this legislation. Such information would be valuable in enabling them to recognize their real friends in this House.

Reference has been made to the attitude of the Federal Farm Loan Board respecting this legislation. I want to give you the facts in the matter. All of us remember the institution of injunction proceedings against the land banks and the history of the litigation which followed. I am not criticizing the Supreme Court, but it was most unfortunate that this suit should have dragged along as it did and that the operation of the land banks should have been suspended so long just at a time when the farmers of the country were in greatest need of the benefits of the system. Of course, the members of the Farm Loan Board are anxious to have the land banks resume business as early and as extensively as possible. Any other attitude on their part would constitute bad faith and no one who knows the members of the Farm Loan Board doubts their desire to promote the efficiency and successful operation of the land banks.

But members of the Farm Loan Board are not in position to dictate terms to Congress nor formulate legislative policies. They are simply asking Congress for what they can get. They went before the Senate and urged the passage of the Senate bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit $50,000,000 to enable the banks to resume and carry on their business. The Senate passed the bill upon the insistence of the Farm Loan Board and the Secretary of the Treasury. The bill came before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House and the committee gave it most thorough consideration and conducted extended hearings. We had before us both Mr. Lobdell and Mr. Lever, of the Farm Loan Board, and Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury. All of them told us that $50,000,000 was the sum required to enable the banks to function and carry on their business as contemplated by the framers of the farm-loan system. The Secretary of the Treasury indorsed the Senate bill for $50,000,000. The members of the Farm Loan Board said they needed that amount of deposits to constitute a sufficient revolving fund or capital with which to do business. After exhaustive consideration and discussion the Committee on Banking and Currency, by a divided vote, ordered the bill reported to the House. Let me add in this connection that when I say the committee was divided I have reference to only one side of the committee. The Democrats, by a united vote, stood in every instance for the largest sum, the greatest measure of relief possible to obtain by this legislation. [Applause.]

When the bill was ordered reported it went to sleep. But while the bill was resting somebody was awake. About ten or twelve days elapsed without any report being made, and finally, without a word of warning Democratic members of the Banking and Currency Committee were notified by certain other members of the committee that we were to meet to receive a re-draft of the measure. We were called back into session without a report of the bill having been made as ordered by the committee and the substitute was laid before us which cut down the amount of $50,000,000 as carried in the original Senate bill and so framed that the amount of deposits which the Secretary of the Treasury is allowed to make can not exceed the sum of $25,000,000. Then it was that members of the Farm Loan Board were called back before the committee. Members of the Farm Loan Board knew the circumstances that had developed since the organization of the farm-loan system. They recognized the impossibility of putting the system to functioning again without assistance and were anxious to secure relief. So, of course, they said, "Yes, we will take $25,000,000 and glad to get it." They were not in a situation to dictate terms nor to complain at what was done. They knew the situation and had to do the best they could.

I asked the chairman of the Federal Farm Loan Board before our committee if this was not the case, that the $25,000,000 provided in the substitute bill, the measure now before the House, was not the minimum amount that would enable the land banks to resume operations, and he said that was stating the matter correctly. But at no time did they say they did not need $50,000,000.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] says that the Democrats in establishing the farm loan system provided for only $6,000,000 Government aid to the revolving fund or capital stock of the banks, and that we are now called on to correct a mistake. If such be true, why should any friend of the farm loan system quarrel about it? Why not welcome the opportunity to correct the mistake, perfect the system, and extend its usefulness? The original farm loan bill made provision for $9,000,000 of Government aid to constitute the original capital stock of the land banks, the Government to be reimbursed automatically as loans were made, the bill providing that borrowers must subscribe to the capital stock of the land banks an amount equal to 5 per cent of each loan obtained. The banks still have $6,000,000 of Government funds represented in capital stock. But, let me say that conditions in the country at the time of the passage of the farm loan act were not what they are now. The demand for loans was not to be compared with the demand existing to-day, and there was no difficulty whatever in selling bonds of the land banks either in large or small amounts.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is it not a fact that we provided for $9,000,000 of stock and $6,000,000 of deposits?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. And they have still $6,000,000 of stock and $6,000,000 of deposits.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is correct. If conditions had remained as they were at the time of the passage of the farm loan act, the difficulties to be found in the present situation would never have existed. The system was gradually developing. As a borrower obtained a loan from a land bank he subscribed 5 per cent of the amount of such loan to the capital stock, so that every time a loan was made the stock was automatically increased. If the war had not come along and conditions had not been disturbed as they were, if injunction proceedings had not been instituted and the land banks forced to shut down, no doubt the capital stock would have been increased to a point where the banks would be on an independent basis. But, unforeseen conditions arose, and it has been necessary to deal with these developments from time to time.

Attention has been called to the fact that the Treasury now holds a large amount of land bank bonds, the total being, as I remember, approximately $183,000,000. This came about because of the conditions to which I have referred and not because of any failure of the land banks to function as expected by the framers of the farm loan act. The bonds of the land banks were finding ready market as fast as they were offered. In fact, they were considered a choice investment. It was because of this fact and the desire of Government officials to remove land bank bonds from competition with Government bonds that legislation was asked authorizing the purchase of these bonds by the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury asked for that legislation. The amount provided in the bill before us under conditions that now exist, considering the vast amount of securities that have been and are being thrown on the market and the great volume of Government bonds that have been absorbed—in the light of all developments since the passage of the original farm loan act—is not a greater sum in proportion to the necessities of the situation than the amount of Government aid provided in the original bill. Those who ask for authority for the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit $50,000,000 in the land banks are not demanding that the Government meet the emergency that exists in agricultural sections or that the Government loan money to the farmers of the country to relieve these conditions. But $50,000,000 is the minimum sum which the Farm Loan Board and the Secretary of the Treasury recommended in addition to the capital on hand to give the banks a revolving fund sufficient to enable them to resume business and gradually market their securities. With conditions as they are to-day it is not practicable to market bonds of the land banks in small amounts. The bonds can best be handled by putting them on the market in large quantities, and the land banks should not be hampered by lack of sufficient capital to conduct business in the most businesslike way. They should not be required to market a small amount of bonds, loan the money to the farmers, then have to take mortgages, and get ready with a new bond issue before doing more business. They should have sufficient capital to keep the forces of the system constantly moving and to afford as nearly a constant supply of money to the farmers of the country as the demand for bonds make possible. If we will provide the necessary increase of working capital, I have no doubt whatever that the bonds of the land banks can be marketed with sufficient success to extend a large share of relief to the agricultural sections of the country and that in a short time the Government can stop the extension of aid and leave the system to stand alone.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. As I understand it, whatever is deposited will not be used except as it is loaned. If the farm loan banks have $25,000,000 in hand and $50,000,000 were set aside by these banks, it would make $75,000,000, and if they loaned $50,000,000 for a bond issue and were able to sell those bonds and returned the money to the Government there would never be but $25,000,000, so that the excess loans would do no harm but would meet a situation that is very urgent.

Mr. STEAGALL. Absolutely. The truth of the matter is this bill ought to carry $100,000,000, which would provide a revolving fund to meet all requirements with something at all times left over. That is what I should like to see done. That would have the effect of serving notice on the investing public that the Government intends to see that this great system, designed to foster the agricultural industry of the country, which lies at the basis of all prosperity and development, should be made to go forward and function. If this were done, there would never be further question about the ability of the farm loan banks to market their bonds in amounts sufficient to catch up the slack and take care of the demands. In my judgment this would go a long way toward relieving the distress which exists among the farmers of the country and which in turn involves every section and every interest of the Nation. Every man who is familiar with conditions understands that not alone is the farmer in need of better credit facilities at this time but any aid to the farmer will enable him to reduce his debt to the merchant and the banker, and in this way bring general relief and improvement.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is it not also true that if they had this larger volume they might make an issue of $40,000,000 of bonds and put them on the market and they would not be forced to suspend business until they had sold the bonds?

Mr. STEAGALL. That states the case admirably. In other words, the system would operate from day to day, instead of at intervals of sixty or ninety days. The banks would resume business in orderly fashion and we should not longer be plied with letters and questions to know when applications would be received for loans and when the system would be ready to resume business. The banks have on hand, as I am informed—I may not be exact in figures—about $140,000,000 of approved applications. I see that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] shakes his head.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STEAGALL. I prefer not to yield right now. The figures may be slightly erroneous, but they are substantially correct. Let me say this, however, you can not estimate the demand by the number of loans that have been approved nor by the number of applications that have reached the land banks. All over the agricultural sections of this country where contraction of currency and restriction of credit and deflation of prices have been felt so much in recent months the people are wanting to know when the land banks will be ready to resume business. They understand that only recently was the case in the Supreme Court terminated, and that the banks are obliged to sell bonds before they can resume business. If we pass the Senate bill, nothing remains but for it to be signed by the President, and no further time will be lost. But if we pass the substitute before the House limiting the amount of aid to $25,000,000 the measure will have to go to a conference committee of the Senate and House, and there is no telling how long the legislation may be delayed.

The recent slump in prices has resulted in a loss to the farmers of the country estimated at the appalling sum of $7,000,000,000. Cotton dropped in a short time from 40 cents to 12 cents, corn from $2 a bushel to 50 cents, hogs from 18 cents to 6 cents, wheat from about $2.50 to a little over $1 per bushel, and other products of the farm in proportion. In the meantime taxes, transportation charges, and nearly everything the farmer has to buy remains on a war basis. These conditions are ruinous not alone to the farmer, but they affect every class and every legitimate interest. No patriotic man can fail to appreciate the situation and the importance of finding a remedy. We passed a bill authorizing the organization of export corporations to assist in exporting our products to foreign markets. We have passed a bill providing for a revival of the War Finance Corporation to assist in marketing American products. I have no doubt this legislation has been helpful. But, in my judgment, no better opportunity can be found to furnish relief to the agricultural sections of the country than in passing legislation to extend proper aid to the land banks.

The legislation involves no departure from the principles upon which the original farm loan act is founded. Moreover, there is no difference so far as the underlying principles of legislation are concerned between extending aid to the extent of $50,000,000 and $25,000,000. The only difference is the extent to which we are willing to go in granting aid. We should make the amount sufficient to enable the land banks to function in a way to take care of the demands and let their business be extended until the stock owned by the borrowers automatically reaches an amount large enough for the system to stand alone. This is the quickest way for the Government to accomplish what it has undertaken to do and terminate its liability. It is not proposed that the Government make any gift or even any loan. It is simply proposed that the Government make use of the land banks for the deposit of Government funds at interest which is to exceed by one-half of 1 per cent the amount of interest borne by the last issue of farm loan bonds. This means a rate of 5½ per cent for funds deposited in the land banks, while the rate paid by other depositories is only 2 per cent. No one has complained about the deposit of Government funds in commercial banks nor even in foreign depositories.

Much has been said in this discussion about the evils of tax-exempt securities. Most of us never heard of this complaint until a few millions of tax-exempt bonds were put on the market, representing loans to the farmers of the country. Such loans to the farmers amount to only $427,000,000. Yet the total of tax-exempt securities in the country, exclusive of all Government bonds, amounts to about $16,000,000,000. The city of New York alone has issued about $4,000,000,000 of tax-exempt securities. But when it is proposed that the Government aid in providing banking facilities suited to the requirements of agriculture a great howl is raised and the charge of socialism and class legislation is heard. Gentlemen who make these complaints are perfectly willing that the Government shall make loans to the railroads and provide hundreds of millions in guaranties to them. We have many millions loaned to the railroads secured by railroad bonds. No complaint has been made about this by the gentlemen who raise the cry of socialism when we undertake to afford adequate banking facilities for the producers of the country. The gentlemen make no protest against giving the railroads access to the Treasury as well as the power to levy exorbitant and in many instances prohibitive transportation charges. Gentlemen who talk much of economy when it is proposed to furnish a pittance of Government aid to the farm loan banks forget all about economy when it is proposed to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to support a vast Military Establishment. The last Army and Navy appropriation bills on their faces carry three-quarters of a billion dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that we are to spend during the next fiscal year $1,100,000,000 on our Army and Navy. This enormous sum is to be expended in time of peace, when the people are burdened with taxes as never before, the world bleeding from the wounds of war and staggering under debts that can not be paid in half a century, and most of the leading nations of earth not in position to undertake war without the assistance of the United States. I voted against the Army and Navy bill, as I have voted against all unjustifiable and outrageous expenditures of the people's money. I shall continue to oppose extravagant and unnecessary appropriations and the creation of useless offices. But true economy demands that every legitimate effort be made to promote the independence and prosperity of those who produce the Nation's wealth and the products of whose toil maintain our financial independence and commercial supremacy among the nations of earth. I am going to introduce a new bill to provide $100,000,000 of capital for the land banks and be ready to take up the fight for adequate relief later on, as I believe it will be necessary to do. But the practical thing for us to do now is to pass the Senate bill providing for aid to the extent of $50,000,000. This legislation we are in position to obtain without further delay, and it will at least afford partial relief. I hope the House will vote down the substitute and pass the Senate bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman: It is a little bit strange that when we begin to discuss the farm loan system and to advocate measures for making the farmers' banking system a success along the lines originally contemplated by Congress the question should arise in the minds of some gentlemen about class legislation and in regard to the Government getting into private business. In the first place, the establishment of the farm loan system did not bring the Government into private business but simply brought its aid and sanction to a most essential national enterprise, upon which rests the prosperity of the Nation's greatest industry—agriculture.

But in view of what has been done for the railroads in extending them Government aid to the extent of $2,000,000,000 and guaranteeing them a 6 per cent income on the estimated value of their properties, and in view of what the Government has done for the commercial banking system, which finances the operations of all industrial enterprises of the country, I deem it very inappropriate that any criticism should be leveled at those who advocate immediate relief and aid to the farm loan banks, or that any effort on the part of the Government to rehabilitate agriculture and assist in rescuing the farmer from his present financial condition should be designated as class legislation.

The present House measure authorizes a Government deposit of $25,000,000 for the use of the farm loan banks. The Senate bill, following the recommendation of the present Secretary of the Treasury, authorized a Federal deposit of $50,000,000. I congratulate the Secretary upon this recommendation, and heartily favor the adoption of the Senate resolution. I would much prefer taking the opinion of the present Secretary of the Treasury upon a matter of this financial importance than the recommendation of those who have reduced that from $50,000,000 to $25,000,000.

The object of Congress in establishing the farm loan system was to give the farmers of the country a banking system backed by the same authority and supported by the same power that had established and maintained the commercial banking system of the country. That means a banking system having the support, cooperation, and aid of the Federal Government.

The conditions surrounding agriculture make a separate and distinct banking system necessary. It will be forever to the credit of the recent Democratic administration that it worked out and established such a system in this country, and it will also be to the credit of the present Republican administration should it champion the legislation necessary to insure the success of that system. A great business question is not necessarily a party issue.

The situation in relation to agriculture in the United States is most critical just at this time, and not through any fault of the farmer himself. The farmers of the United States rose to the highest standard of patriotic effort for increased production to meet the needs of the Nation during the war. The 1919–20 crop was produced during the peak of price inflation, and was the most expensive crop to its producers ever known in this country. This fact, together with the credit contraction begun in the fall of 1920, creates the supreme difficulty now.

Whether done deliberately and designedly or not, the policy of deflation or credit contraction was precipitated just as the farmer was ready to market this very expensive crop. I was among the delegation of Representatives and Senators, along with many people engaged in agriculture and the live-stock industry who came to Washington in October, 1920, and appealed to the then Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board against the announced intention to inaugurate the policy of credit contraction, and urged a further extension of agricultural credit until the crop could be marketed in an orderly fashion.

It has been conservatively estimated that the farmers of America lost $8,500,000,000 on the 1920 crop. Of that amount the live-stock industry alone lost $1,400,000,000. The loss of the other $7,100,000,000 fell upon the producers of cotton, sugar, rice, grain, tobacco, and other farm products. This loss was one-third of the total value of the crop and represents a decline in the price of farm products from the previous year of 70 per cent. This loss is equal to one-third of the amount spent by this Government in the World War. So there should be no surprise that the farmer to-day finds himself in need of credit in order to hold his organization together and bridge him over the period of readjustment.

It is estimated that the passage of this resolution, and I refer to the Senate resolution providing an additional $50,000,000 revolving fund, will enable the Farm Loan Board to grant loans to the extent of $200,000,000 a year. There are now pending $140,000,000 of approved applications. It is of supreme importance that Congress act upon this matter immediately in order to bring assistance to America's greatest industry.

Mr. Chairman, I do not like to divide the American people up into classes, especially in relation to business and enterprise. The success and prosperity of the American people as a whole is based upon the success of all their enterprises, whether they be industrial, commercial, or agricultural. But just now we should not overlook the fact that while the entire assets of this Nation are estimated to be about $270,000,000,000, $85,000,000,000 of this is represented by agriculture, and that farming is America's biggest business and her basic industry.

Insuring the success of the farm loan system is simply one of the steps that must be taken for the improvement of agriculture. Another should be a better marketing system. And one second in importance to none is the question of transportation. Among all the burdensome taxes now paid by those engaged in agricultural pursuits and business in general is that of freight rates. These rates are now, on an average, 80 per cent higher than before the war. On some commodities they are 200 to 300 per cent higher. The total additional charge on live stock and farm products amounts to more than $1,000,000,000 annually. It has been estimated that more than $3,000,000,000 worth of farm products are not shipped at all, simply go to waste, because the freight charges amount to more than the sale price of the product when it reaches the market. Vigorous steps should be taken to remedy a situation of this character, and it is entirely useless for Congress and those in authority to simply await developments, trusting in some kind Providence to provide a remedy or in the patience and long-suffering of the people to overlook their negligence and inaction.

But to return to the measure under consideration for the relief of the farm loan banks and answering the suggestion that the present need for such legislation may indicate an inherent defect in the system, it is very evident when the facts are recalled that such is not the case. Before and for some time after our entrance into the late war every issue of farm loan bonds placed upon the market was promptly taken. With the investing public these bonds ranked as a choice security; so much so that during the war the Federal Farm Loan Board, at the request of the Government, withdrew from the market so that the bonds of the farm loan banks would not come in competition with Liberty bonds and war savings stamps. So this interrupted the orderly functioning of the system.

Then later came the suit of the old-line mortgage and trust companies, who sought to destroy the farm loan system by having the act creating it declared unconstitutional. Pending the decision of this suit, which was in the Supreme Court of the United States for more than a year, the whole machinery was practically paralyzed, as no bonds could be sold with the constitutionality of the law in question. The constitutionality of the law was upheld throughout by the highest court of the land, and thus ended the conspiracy for the destruction of the law by its enemies.

Mr. Chairman, in my own judgment the act of Congress creating the farm loan system and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in sustaining it will in the future be regarded as the charter of liberty for a safe and adequate system of agricultural financing. So let us take advantage of this opportunity to guarantee to it the fullest measure of success.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON].

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think it was in January, 1920, that it was announced through the press of the country that the Federal Reserve Board would curtail all speculative credits. Now, whatever the intention of the Federal Reserve Board may have been, the effect, in fact, was to curtail all credits, with the result that many of the loans of the western banks were called in, and the western banks in turn were compelled to call in the loans of their customers. The price of all farm products throughout the Nation within a few months dropped over 25 per cent in value, and they have continued to go down until to-day your wheat has gone down more than 100 per cent, your hogs more than 300 per cent, and your cattle about 250 per cent. Now, then, if there ever was a time when the Nation would be justified in extending aid and assistance in the manner in which this bill seeks to give it that time is now. My only regret is that the aid extended is not larger than it is under the provisions of the committee amendment.

I want to congratulate the chairman of this committee upon the splendid address which he made this afternoon relative to the tax-exempt securities. To my mind, that is one of the great menaces that this Government is facing at the present time. He stated, I believe, that there were something like $14,000,000,000 of those securities outstanding. I have been carefully compiling figures for weeks upon this subject and I am confident that when the outstanding tax certificates and the warrants of indebtedness of cities, counties, and States are added to the tax-exempt securities he referred to we shall have an aggregate of more than $16,000,000,000 of them. This Government, as a result, has lost the revenue upon an income of nearly $950,000,000, and that would mean a net revenue of not less than $190,000,000. This is now entirely lost to the Government. More than this, the fact that the people have been able to put their money into tax-exempt securities—and I hope all Members of this House who did not hear the gentleman's speech will read it—has resulted in taking away from the farmer any possibility of floating farm loans with independent companies or individuals at any reasonable rates of interest. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KING. I was going to ask the gentleman a question, but I will desist.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I am in favor of this bill. It is a tardy acknowledgment of what we owe to the agricultural class of this country. The farmers, in my judgment, more than any other one class, represent the basic industry without which this Nation can not live, and if there is any excuse anywhere for tax-exempt securities, it is the bonds of the Federal farm loan bank. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the spring of 1920 the House had up a bill providing a $100,000,000 appropriation fund available for the Farm Loan Board to take care of the loans which had been applied for and approved prior to March 20, 1920. While that bill was under consideration I offered an amendment providing for an additional $100,000,000 to take care of loans for farmers up to the 20th of March, 1921, the object of which was to take care of the loans while the Supreme Court was deliberating upon the constitutionality of the law. If that amendment had been agreed to by the House—and it was defeated by a partisan vote—the troubles which now beset the agricultural sections of the United States would have been largely obviated, so far as money is concerned. Now, we have been told that the Farm Loan Board has approved loans amounting to $140,000,000 to the farmers of the United States, but that $140,000,000 does not adequately express the real needs of the agricultural interests of this country. I recall particularly the conditions which exist and have existed within my own district for the past year and a half. The farmers there produce a product which finds its market almost entirely in Europe; 87 or 90 per cent of that product is shipped abroad. During the winter and spring of 1920 and from that time on until now the European market has been completely demoralized and unable to obtain the funds with which to make purchases of this American product. The farmers who, when land was high during the war and following the war, bought little farms at prices which were abnormal, are now undergoing foreclosures, and the only thing that can relieve them from losing their homes is for the Government to deposit sufficient money with the Farm Loan Board to enable that board to make loans to them to tide them over for a few years and save their lifetime earnings and savings, and at the same time finance their agricultural enterprises. Not only that, but many farmers who are not in actual danger of losing their homes need funds to tide them over until the markets for farm products offer greater returns than at present. So, I do not believe we ought to agree to the amendment which has been brought in here by the committee.

The Farm Loan Board when it laid this matter before the Senate urged $50,000,000, and they told the Senate committee, and the Senate was so advised, that at that time the farmers of the United States needed more than $50,000,000, but if the board had $50,000,000 they might be able to tide over and save the situation. I do not understand the board has changed its opinion since the Senate passed this bill.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I can not yield in five minutes.

Mr. KING. I wanted to give the gentleman a little information. He is in error.

Mr. BARKLEY. I know the gentleman can do that, but I would be glad to have him do it in his own time.

The Farm Loan Board, I understand, did say that they could get along with $25,000,000, but it is inconceivable that a board with the experience of the Farm Loan Board a month ago wanted $50,000,000 and now wants only $25,000,000. Of course, they will take whatever they can get. But $25,000,000 is not a drop in the ocean compared with what the agricultural sections of the United States need, and there is not a member of the committee or a man in this House who thinks $25,000,000 is all the farmers of the United States need to borrow at this time. They tried to sell $40,000,000 of farm loan bonds, and have not been able to sell them yet, and this bill provides only $25,000,000——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. BARKLEY. It provides that when this $25,000,000 is deposited in the farm loan banks, and they then put another bond issue on the market in 15 days after the issue is closed, the Secretary of the Treasury must call on the farm loan banks to return the $25,000,000. Instead of having a revolving fund that the Farm Loan Board can use in making loans, as soon as the $25,000,000 called for in this bill is loaned and used as a basis for farm loan bonds, and the board gets in the money for the sale of the bonds, the board must take that money and pay it into the Treasury of the United States and leave the Farm Loan Board and the farm loan banks in as bad a situation as they are now. I hope the amount provided in this House substitute will be increased to at least $50,000,000, and, as a matter of fact, it ought to be increased to $100,000,000. But if the committee amendment can not be amended to increase the amount to at least $50,000,000, I hope the substitute will be defeated and the Senate bill will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is a Member's duty to voice his sentiments as well as to vote, and I rise to voice the sentiment of those who oppose this bill. It directs the United States to deposit $25,000,000 for farm loans, and the party that is crying for economy and shouting for economy are unanimous not only for this but in asking $25,000,000 more. Meanwhile the United States is short of revenue. We do not get sufficient in taxes to cover what we spend.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Excuse me, as I have but five minutes.

The deficit from day to day is borrowed. The United States owes $8,000,000,000 in notes and in short-term bonds, coming due within two years, and the Treasury is carried in the meantime by the banks. The times are such, with falling prices not only in farms but all over the country, that it is mighty doubtful whether the banks can continue to do this. And it is doubtful——

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I can not yield. I have only five minutes.

And it is doubtful also whether in these times the United States can borrow at reasonable interest and fund its debt. The United States has already $183,000,000 of farm loan bonds which it has bought. It has deposited $6,000,000 for the farm loans. Those loans will not sell at 5 per cent, and the United States is now asked to deposit $25,000,000 more in order that there may be issued by the Farm Loan Board several million dollars more of tax-free farm loan bonds at 5½ per cent, in order seemingly to spoil the market for the United States securities at any reasonable rate of interest, and also in order to induce the farmer to mortgage his farm when farm prices are falling and when such a mortgage is the best way to ruin the farmer. I can not help opposing this bill.

I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR].

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman stated, if I understood him right, that we were spending more money than we had collected by taxes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I did.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is the gentleman aware that so far during this fiscal year our excess of revenue is $450,000,000 more than our expenditures?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am not aware of that.

Mr. DUNBAR. That is so stated in the daily statement of the United States Treasury.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There are times of the year when the income tax comes in and certain times when it does not.

I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman seems to be familiar with Government figures and statistics, and I want to ask him if he can tell us how much has been loaned by the Government to the railroads and what sort of security the Government has for those loans?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The Government had to run the railroads during the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Federal farm loan banks have proven themselves indispensable to the very life and prosperity of our Nation. The purpose of the act creating them was to make it possible for those who desired to purchase and own homes to borrow money at a reasonable rate of interest and on long time, with easy terms of payment. In this way it was made easier for the poor man wherever he lived to buy and pay for a home for himself and family, and for this and many other reasons the successful functioning of the several Federal land banks was and is most vital to our people.

However, notwithstanding their great importance, these banks have from the beginning been seriously handicapped in their operations. In the first place, only $6,000,000 were allowed to them as a working capital, and under the act as originally drawn the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to deposit not exceeding that sum in the several banks. Evidently that sum was not sufficient to furnish an adequate working capital and the banks have been seriously handicapped.

In the second place, the interests and forces that fought the passage of the law creating these banks did not relinquish their efforts when the law was finally enacted, but they carried their fight to the courts, and for many months the work of the whole Federal farm loan bank system was suspended entirely, notwithstanding the fact that applications for hundreds of loans were made from time to time during the litigation involving the future of the land bank system.

Fortunately, the Supreme Court of the United States has given its decision settling finally in favor of the banks the questions of legality involved and has sustained the original act in its entirety and has swept away all legal objections and left the banks free and unhampered in their future operations.

The bill now before us is intended to meet and solve the first difficulty of insufficient working capital and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit, in addition to the amount already authorized, such sums as in his discretion he may direct until the aggregate paid-in capital of the 12 banks reaches the sum of $50,000,000. In other words, the House bill, which is offered as an amendment to the Senate bill, would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit in the several banks an amount equal to $25,000,000 more than is authorized under the present law. The Senate bill authorizes the deposit of $50,000,000, or twice as much as the House bill.

I am in favor of the Senate bill and will vote against the House amendment, with the hope that the Senate amendment will be adopted. But if the House bill is substituted for the Senate bill, I shall, nevertheless, vote for the House bill, because it will be the best I can do. Since the money is in no sense a loan or a charge upon the Public Treasury, I think it would be very much better to give the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion authority to deposit at least $50,000,000 in order to make sure that the land banks have ample capital to carry on their work without cessation and without further difficulties on account of insufficient capital.

Mr. Chairman, I feel very much in earnest about this matter, because it touches vitally the welfare of my people. I doubt if there are many of us who really appreciate the conditions just now confronting the farmers and producers of this country. They have been caught, so to speak, between the upper and nether millstone. They planted and grew a crop last year at extraordinary cost which they were forced to market at a great loss, and this year's crop does not have much value just now as a basis for credit, and it is difficult indeed for the farmer or producer to get money to pay the expenses of running his farm or to pay the indebtedness against it.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] just a moment ago voiced his opposition to this bill and gave as a reason that we would have to raise a certain amount of revenue within the next two years to meet expenses of the Government and discharge the maturing Government obligations, and he correctly placed this amount at a very large figure; but he does this bill an injustice by assuming that it will call for an appropriation when, as a matter of fact, no appropriation whatever is contemplated. I want to say further to the gentleman from New Jersey that one of the best ways to meet the needs of the Government is to encourage the basic industry of this Nation in such a way as to permit our farmers and producers to survive and prosper, and all other industries will likewise survive and prosper, and we will thus produce sufficient taxes to meet the running expenses of our Government. [Applause.]

Those familiar with the live-stock industry in the South and West know that the herds are being rapidly depleted, because the owners have not the money to finance their business and to pay their debts. They have been caught in the depression and their products have not furnished sufficient security to enable them to borrow the money necessary to meet the condition of emergency into which they have been so suddenly thrown, and this law and the passage of this bill will carry relief to many of them. If something is not done, many farms, ranches, and herds will go under the hammer and be sold at public auction at a tremendous sacrifice.

This is indeed a critical time in our history. It is a time when it is necessary for us to aid in every way possible those who have suffered so much by reason of the sudden deflation in the Nation's currency, and I for one am glad that this bill has been reported by the committee. I am glad it comes with a strong indorsement from almost the entire membership of the committee, and I sincerely trust that the Senate provision will be retained in the bill and that $50,000,000 instead of $25,000,000 will be made available for the purpose of loaning money to those who are so much distressed financially just at this time. Since it calls for no direct appropriation and makes no public charge upon the Treasury, I fail to see how any man can oppose the bill or deny the relief that it seeks to give. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. WINGO. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for one minute.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, this bill as passed by the Senate authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to deposit with the Federal Farm Loan Board for its temporary use any moneys in the Treasury which have not already been appropriated, to the extent of $50,000,000 and at an interest rate of 5½ per cent. When the bill reached this House, the Committee on Banking and Currency cut the amount of this loan from $50,000,000 to approximately $25,000,000, and, since an amendment has been presented restoring the amount in the Senate bill, we are now to choose between these amounts. I am in favor of the larger amount. I would, in fact, be in favor of making it $100,000,000 or more, and my reasons are these:

The Treasury now deposits its moneys in banks and elsewhere, and the largest amount of interest it receives for any of these moneys is 2 per cent. To-day there are in special depositories $542,000,000, and these depositories pay the Government only 2 per cent interest. Deposited in Federal reserve banks are $75,000,000, while in foreign depositories there are $53,843,000, and so on. I see no reason why it is not to the advantage of this Government to get the highest possible rate of interest out of this money. The highest interest now paid for it is 2 per cent, while this bill authorizes the Federal farm loan banks to pay 5½ per cent. From the standpoint of good business it behooves the Government to take advantage of this higher interest rate, and from this standpoint alone, I can hardly see how an unselfish Member of this House can oppose the bill as it passed the Senate.

If the money in question belonged to an individual Member of this House or to a private corporation of which he was a stockholder, does anyone believe that he would be content to its loan at 2 per cent when a larger interest could be obtained?

No; this is not the belief of the people; and because of the too frequent examples of a regard for the governmental interests that is more careless than the regard for personal gains there is steadily growing throughout the country a distrust of the Congress and its Members.

In addition to this, it is necessary and vital for the Federal farm loan banks to have additional capital. There are now pending the applications of farmers for loans amounting to over $140,000,000. On account of the hostile attacks made upon these banks in the courts and elsewhere by selfish interests, their operation has been stopped for about a year and a half, and during that period they have made no loans nor sold bonds nor increased their capital stocks. Because of the tightness of money, their bonds are not now readily salable and it is necessary for their life that they begin to function, and that immediately, for the public good. A substantial loan to them by the United States Treasury will enable them to quicken into business again and function until their capital is large enough for them to stand alone.

In addition to this, the farmers of the country need, and need badly, all the help that can be rendered them. Everyone on this floor admits that farming is the basic industry of this Nation; that upon that industry depends the very existence of the Nation. Everyone is loud in praise of the patriotism and labor of the farmer. All render him mouth service, but when it comes to extending to him material aid there is failure on all sides. I think it behooves the farmer to be up and doing in the matter of organization. As other industries have done, he will have to organize in order to present his proper demands and put to an end the unjust discrimination that has been meted out to him by his Government. He should not have to come to this Congress on bended knees begging for a mite when he is entitled to so much. I do not believe, however, that the farmer will ever secure all that he deserves until he is organized as are the railroad workers to-day. Then will his influence be felt and his condition materially improved.

The railroads have had handed to them billions of dollars by this Congress. Every demand made by them has been granted. The Esch-Cummins law requires us to pay them millions of dollars annually on watered stock—stock that does not represent a penny of investment. The packers and the other trusts and combinations get pretty well what they want out of Congress. Compare what these concerns secure with what has been done for the farmer in recent years. They have reaped substantial benefits and subsidies while he has futile promises and empty praise. It has been stated that the farmer has capital investments now of $80,000,000,000, and in this he received during the past year no returns, although mortgages on this called for large interest amounts. This condition, of course, makes him worse off now than he was last year. The investments of all other businesses were about double the capital of the farmer and yielded a return of over $20,000,000,000. It is not mere luck that makes this vast and unfair difference in the profits of the two classes. It has also been said that the total rediscounts of the Federal farm reserve banks were $14,000,000,000, and of that amount agriculture received 14 per cent; manufacturing, 21 per cent; merchandising, 26 per cent; speculation and miscellaneous, 39 per cent. Consider that of the primary deposits in all of the banks of the United States agriculture furnishes approximately 50 per cent; labor, 20 per cent; and all other businesses, 30 per cent. Upon these facts agriculture, entitled to more than merchandising and manufacturing combined, should have received $7,000,000,000, but instead it only got a paltry $2,000,000,000. The law which permits the Federal reserve allotment of credit is unfair to agriculture, and more than this, it has the direct and arbitrary purpose and effect of forcing a deflation in farm prices. The law which permits this credit monopoly should be changed. The farmer is made to sell his stuff. Not only can he not secure a loan on it but the credit that is denied him is freely extended those who want to fleece him. Ample loans are made to businesses inimical to the welfare of the farmer, and this, too, by governmental agencies which should be fair and impartial in dealing with all classes of industries and citizens.

Every other industry except farming secures practically everything that it wants out of this Government. This is one of the first instances where the farmer has had a chance to secure that which is his due, and I think common decency requires this House to give him the Senate bill instead of the House bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for one minute.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that members of the Farm Loan Board are absolutely in favor of this proposition. It is not being crammed down their throats, but it is fully acceptable to them. I spoke personally to Judge Charles E. Lobdell and to Mr. Asbury F. Lever in the committee room, and they recited what has already been stated to the committee, that the bill as recommended by the committee is to their satisfaction.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] expressed some doubt as to whether the farmers' credits were deflated deliberately or not. I want to state to the gentleman from Louisiana that last September—and the proof of it would be forthcoming if this House should grant the passage of a simple resolution to give authority to investigate how the Federal Reserve Board has been functioning in the last few years—I say in September last they deliberately sat down to their table resolved to deflate the farmers' credits.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. KING. They sat around the board table, a secret board, a star-chamber proceeding; the Federal Reserve Board sat down to their table—the board that regulates the price of commodities as well as the rates of interest in this country—and Mr. Harding, the president of the board, opened the meeting, not with prayer but by suggesting deliberately, "I presume, gentlemen, we are all agreed that it is better to be unanimous than to be right." [Laughter.] I have made that statement before. The board was unanimous, and the farmers' credits were then and there deflated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my time being about expired, I shall take advantage of the consent of the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman already has that privilege.

Mr. KING. I so understand.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 20 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWLING].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. BOWLING. Mr. Chairman, this bill in effect provides for a working capital for the farm loan banks by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit public funds with these banks in amount equal to the difference between the capital of the banks and $50,000,000. It will be observed there is nothing mandatory in the proposed bill, but a declaration that the Secretary of the Treasury may "in his discretion" make these deposits.

There is a great and pressing necessity for this legislation, owing to the extraordinary financial depression now on in the agricultural sections of the country.

There are some strange features about the farmer's business in the United States. Farmers are urged to be industrious, and they are, necessarily. The Department of Agriculture is spending great sums of money to teach more intensive and more scientific farming, and yet a strange result appears; that is, that the more the farmer makes the less he gets for it. If the cotton farmers make a 10,000,000-bale crop they get more for it than they get for a 15,000,000-bale crop. When he makes a great crop they say he has overproduced, and when he makes a small crop he is told to make more. I think this bill will aid somewhat, but it can not possibly relieve the situation as it should, because the amount of money is entirely inadequate. Yet it is a step in the right direction, and for that reason I favor it, not that I am satisfied with it. I would prefer to see inserted here a greater sum.

The statement of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] that the Government can not afford to advance this money does not strike me with much force. I would rather see in this bill a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to do this than to see in it a mere authorization. While he may go on and do it, the financial situation is so complicated that he might fail to do it and yet have a good reason to assign for not doing it. I have heard so much in the last few months about departments and governmental agencies violating the law, and about the General Staff of the Army doing this and that and the other thing, that I would like to see inserted in this bill, which is of importance to the farmer, a specific direction that can not be escaped.

There is a situation that is illustrated by a little story that came up from the war. A drafted man was having his questionnaire filled out, and the friend who was assisting him came to this particular question: "Have you any dependent relatives?" The reply was: "Yes; I have plenty of relatives, but you can not put any dependence in them." [Laughter.] That is the situation that sometimes comes to us when we contemplate legislation through a commission or giving somebody discretion to do something. We may be pardoned for being a little suspicious when we consider how often the farmer has been made the goat. Last year was the most expensive year that the farmers of the South ever knew, and that year cost more than any other on account of the artificial restrictions which were created by the Federal banking system. It was intended that the system should be a great agency for making an elastic currency and giving opportunity for the movement of crops at gathering time; but last fall right at the time when a great amount of money was needed the supply was cut off, and this artificial restriction of credit has put into bankruptcy thousands and tens of thousands of people in the United States.

This little measure of relief is just simply a mere dole coming apparently grudgingly from the Congress of the United States. The farmers have not enough friends at court. This is one trouble. As the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] suggested here a while ago, other interests have been taken care of and have usually received about what they asked for when they came to Congress, but the voice of the farmer is lost in the clamor for assistance coming up from other industries in the land. I think we ought to go just as far as we possibly can in giving this assistance, and not grudgingly, as it is given by Congress.

I have never been able to understand why the farmer has to assume the rôle of a mendicant and adopt the tone of a beggar when he asks Congress for some relief. Is not his the foundation industry of the world? Have we forgotten the appeal made to him when we were at war to produce as largely as possible? And have we forgotten how nobly he answered the appeal by producing the greatest crop in all history?

And this notwithstanding the fact that millions of young men had been withdrawn from industry and inducted into the Army and Navy.

The transportation systems received their millions when they asked for them. The national banks have for a generation been the recipients of valuable favors from the Government in the way of deposits at low interest rates. Now we have an opportunity to assist the farm loan banks, and we should do so, gladly and liberally.

Let us recall to-day that the crop of 1920 cost more to produce than any other crop ever raised. This is certainly true of the cotton crop. Wages, fertilizer, tools, transportation, everything that entered into the industry was at the highest level. The cotton crop cost from 25 to 30 cents per pound to put it on the market, where, instead of a profit, the cost of production could not be had. It is to-day a drug on the market at 11 cents per pound, and bankruptcy threatens thousands.

We are told that there is too much gold in America; that we now have more than three and one-half billions of the world's supply. With this enormous money supply, entirely sufficient for every legitimate business in America, there not only exists no reason for the present money stringency but its presence amounts to a national scandal. Somebody is "playing horse" with the American people.

It has been estimated by the National Farmers' Union that the present financial depression has cost the farmers $7,000,000,000—an amount equal to nearly one-third of the national debt.

This is a loss so serious, so far reaching in its influence, that its cause should be accurately determined and the responsibility forever fixed, to the end that it may not again occur.

It appears to me that the principal causes are well set forth in a recent bulletin of the Farmers' Union, from which I quote the following:

> The farmer produced his last crops under the most expensive conditions and at the greatest cost, but has been obliged to dispose of them at deflated prices and has sustained to date a total loss of $7,000,000,000.
> The principal direct causes for these losses are as follows:
> 1. Unnecessary profiteering of middle men, which includes speculative gambling.
> 2. Arbitrary restriction of credit by the Federal reserve bank and the holding up of the Federal land banks by litigation.
> 3. The unreasonable rise in railroad rates.

Of these three reasons I would call special attention to No. 2. Credit is capital; credit is the life of business, for the simple reason that there is not sufficient money in the world to do business on a cash basis. The establishment of the Federal reserve banking system, with its regional banks located at convenient points, with the power and resources of the Government behind the system, was hailed as the dawning of a new era, when an elastic currency would be provided, always sufficient for every emergency and automatically responding to the demands of business.

The system proved its worth in the war when unprecedented demands were met and the greatest war in history was financed without a suggestion of lack of money.

This great system was not organized primarily for the purpose of making money, but the profits in 1920 were $120,000,000.

It would seem that if the Federal reserve could function so smoothly and with such astonishing success in war it would be able to do even better in peace, and so secure a lasting prosperity to the people. Instead of that we find that last fall, just at the time when the crops began to move, just when credits should have expanded, there was, for no good reason, such an artificial restriction of credit as to result in the almost complete cessation of business and the financial ruin of thousands. It was unthinkable that such a thing should be deliberately done, yet the evidence leads to no other conclusion. Some of the results of this almost criminal action of the Federal Reserve Board may be seen in the fact that cotton dropped from $150 per bale to $50, wheat from $2.50 per bushel to $1.30, corn from $1.50 to 61 cents, and all along the line is the same story of wreck and ruin.

The policy of "deflation" or "liquidation" was made in face of the fact that the farmers furnished one-half of the money deposited in the banks. But although he furnishes one-half, does he get one-half when he goes to borrow? No, verily! Instead of 50 per cent, to which he is entitled by every rule of right, he is allowed only 14 per cent, while the manufacturer, who is entitled to 21.4 per cent, gets 21 per cent; the merchant gets 26 per cent; and speculation and miscellaneous applications get 39 per cent.

The amount loaned speculators allowed them to speculate in wheat and thereby cause wheat growers a loss of 70 cents per bushel. They speculated in cotton and cost the cotton producer a loss of $75 to $100 per bale.

These are some of the reasons why agriculture languishes to-day and why from all over the land there comes an insistent cry for relief.

The bill under consideration affords a small measure of relief, little enough, in all conscience; but, small as it is, it is welcomed. I understand that an amendment will be offered increasing the available deposit to one hundred million. I shall support it heartily, and hope it will be adopted.

The Federal land bank has become an integral part of our financial system. The farm loan system is an established fact. As such it is the duty of everyone to support it heartily. To my mind it is one of the most commendable features of our financial system. Land furnishes the world's best security, and a bond backed by land is as safe as the Government. This bill appropriates no money and will cost the Government nothing. On the other hand, it will be a safe investment, returning a small but certain interest.

I trust this legislation will pass, and that soon we may have an opportunity to consider other legislation affording additional relief to the innocent victims of a useless money panic.

Mr. WINGO. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS].

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman and gentleman, I hope that the House amendment, reducing, by nearly $25,000,000, the amount carried in the Senate bill, will be voted down. I think the Senate bill ought to be adopted without amendment. I think this Congress ought to provide a revolving fund of $50,000,000 for this purpose. It is variously estimated that the number of applications for loans is extremely great, amounting in the aggregate to from $75,000,000 to possibly $300,000,000. The $25,000,000 provided in the House amendment, added to the capital of the farm loan banks will not in my opinion be enough to meet this situation. I believe that this Congress should readily make proper advancements to such banks for the farmers of the United States in their present distressed condition. The letters and information which I have received indicate the most deplorable state of affairs. If this Nation is going to hold the farmers of the United States upon the farms and is going to be able to depend upon them to continue to produce the food supply and the clothing materials for the people of the United States, it must come to their relief. This relief is already too belated. It ought, as stated, to be forthcoming, not only to the extent provided by the House amendment, but to the extent provided by the Senate bill, or perhaps even a greater amount, as it would be if the Congress of the United States could be made to realize just what the true conditions are.

Few measures thus enacted for the benefit of the agricultural interests of this country have resulted in as much good to the farmers and the rest of the people of this Nation as has the Federal farm loan act passed by a Democratic Congress in 1916. Up to that time the farmers of the United States had been at the mercy of the loan sharks and all others who sought to exact from them the very last penny of interest which could be possibly squeezed out of such borrowers who were compelled by reason of reverses or other necessity to obtain loans at no matter what sacrifice or cost.

After the passage of the farm loan act and as soon as the banks and associations provided for therein could be organized and put into operation, the days of extortion in interest rates, with the consequent absorption, in cases of default, of all the property pledged for payment, almost completely passed away, until the same interests framed an assault upon the constitutionality of such law and caused practically suspension of the farm loan banks for over a year or more, when the Supreme Court of the United States upheld the act in every particular.

During such time, when the validity of the farm loan act was under fire by selfish and sordid interests, it was impossible for the farm loan banks to function because of the uncertainty in the minds of the people as to the ultimate action of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the reluctance of the last Republican Congress to sufficiently assist the farm loan banks to tide over, in any adequate degree, the difficulties which they and their borrowers were encountering.

The loan sharks and exploiters were again in the saddle, not only refusing to lend farmers money except upon most exorbitant rates of interest and excessive costs of consummation of loans, but also demanding that such loans should be for unreasonably long periods of time—often for 10 years or more; so that even when the Supreme Court of the United States had decided the test case involving the constitutionality of the farm loan act, that the farmers could not even then escape from the clutches of the extortioners and obtain the benefits of the lower rates of interest and extremely favorable conditions of repayment of loan offered under the farm-loan system.

To give some idea of the tremendous demand among the agricultural interests for loans, I call attention to what the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency has just announced on the floor of the House, in response to a question from me, that it was impossible now to obtain accurate information as to the amount of pending loans applied for, but that the estimate of the same was all the way from $75,000,000 to $300,000,000. This emphasizes the tremendous need of the farmers of this country for the credit facilities provided by the farm loan banks. Of course, the powers granted to such banks do not include power to make loans for many other needs of the farmers, which must be supplied through other banking agencies.

The tremendous depreciation which has manifested itself throughout the whole country and which has visited upon the agricultural interests, particularly, the very heaviest of burdens has resulted in increasing the need of the farmers for adequate credit and credit facilities to enable them to tide over the disaster with which many of them have been and are still threatened. We all realize how nobly and wonderfully they responded to the call of the country for bumper crops, not only during the period of the war but since such time, and it surely behooves the Government to do its part in helping the farmers now.

What does this bill propose to do? Simply to deposit in the farm loan banks in the various banking districts throughout the United States the sum of approximately $25,000,000 to enable such banks to make loans to prospective borrowers without waiting until the necessary farm loan bonds can be sold in the market. The advances—and that is all they are—by the Government under this bill must be repaid just as soon as the farm-loan bonds have been sold; and for such accommodation the borrowing banks must pay the Government a rate of interest a half a cent higher than the interest provided for in the bonds, as well as fully securing the Treasury by the pledge of such bonds, with mortgage security, equal to the advances made.

I must say that I can see nothing particularly generous in the action of the Government as reflected in this bill. It is purely a business transaction which operates to the pecuniary advantage of the Government, even though it provides an accommodation in a limited degree to the farm loan banks and their prospective borrowers. In fact, the interest charge against the farm loan banks is about 3½ per cent greater than that made by the Government against national banks for deposits of Government funds. Of course, these interest charges must be absorbed by the farm loan banks and transferred to their borrowers as a part of the cost of loans.

I do not believe that this exaction ought to be made by the Government, and particularly when the amount to be advanced is as small as that carried by the House amendment to the Senate bill.

The Senate undoubtedly gave this matter most careful consideration before passing the measure, which, as enacted by that body, carried an advancement of $50,000,000 to the farm loan banks instead of only a trifle over $25,000,000, as provided by the House amendment. Certainly $50,000,000 is little and inadequate enough when it is considered that the pending applications for loans amount, probably, at a conservative estimate, to $150,000,000.

The Treasury does not stand to lose a dollar. It has the greatest gold reserve in the history of the Nation. The preservation of the great agricultural interests of this country is at stake.

Certainly you gentlemen of the majority party in control of Congress and of the Government are not going to sit here and provide appropriations of over three-quarters of a billion dollars for armaments and agencies of destruction of both life and property, as an actual expenditure, and refuse to provide a temporary loan of only $50,000,000 for one of the greatest constructive industries of the Nation, and which may be the means of saving from calamity the great farming industry of this country.

The cost of a single great battleship, such as the Government is building to-day, with her armament, amounts approximately to $40,000,000, a sum almost inconceivably large to the average mind which is not conversant with the tremendous costs of modern ships of war. And when it is considered that the chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs recently stated to me on the floor of this House that the cost of completing the present naval building program alone would amount to something between $800,000,000 and $900,000,000, without reference to maintenance costs, it is easy to realize why the people, with a national debt already of approximately $25,000,000,000, are getting restless under the weight of the crushing load of taxation necessary to keep up such implements of war, especially when it is so difficult even to get loans from the Government upon gilt-edge security to promote the constructive works of peace as reflected in the development of products of the soil and trade of the Nation along all lines.

Not two months ago the Republican majority, through the committee in charge of appropriations for the Army, brought into this House the Army appropriation bill providing $83,000,000 to pay for the enlisted personnel of an Army which was larger by 18,000 men than was provided for just two months before in the same measure as passed by the House during the last session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, but which finally failed to pass and had to be reintroduced at this session of the new Congress. Of course, the $83,000,000 was not the full sum carried by the Army appropriation bill. That amounted to approximately $325,000,000. But what I refer to specifically is the increase of $10,000,000 provided in the same Army appropriation bill as reintroduced in this session of Congress over and above the sum provided for the same purpose in the same bill at the last session of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

At that time the present chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. ANTHONY, in charge of the Army appropriation bill, reported an appropriation of $72,678,659, which was sufficient to provide for an enlisted personnel of 150,000 soldiers, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts and flying cadets. It was urged by him and the leaders on his side that an Army of that size was ample; but a little more than two months later the same Appropriations Committee has urged upon this Congress an Army of 168,000 men, at an increased initial cost to the Nation of over $10,000,000 a year, without reference to the added and incidental cost to be borne by the people by reason of such increase in the Army, and without showing any necessity therefor.

It is to the credit, however, of the small Democratic minority, aided by a number of Republicans who refused to be bound by any such plan for a larger standing Army, that the House of Representatives, by a close vote, rejected the provision for increasing the Army to 168,000 men and restored the reduced amount carried in the same bill at the last session, providing for an Army of 150,000 enlisted men. Even then, with the Philippine Scouts, flying cadets, and officers, the size of the Army would be approximately 175,000 men, almost twice as great as it was before the World War.

Although the Senate sought to raise the size of the Army to 170,000 men, with the necessary increase of appropriation therefor, the bill as it finally came out of conference between the House and Senate resulted in a compromise, which, through the firm stand taken by the Democratic minority, with the aid, as stated, of certain Republicans, effected a saving of $5,000,000 to the people. But even the final sum of $77,000,000 provided for enlisted personnel was $5,000,000 more than ought to have been carried in the bill, which provides in all more than $323,000,000 for the Army.

To see if a halt or reduction could not be made in the continuance of the enormous costs and program of naval armament, and in view of the expressed willingness of other great nations to view such proposal with favor, amendments were proposed by two Democratic Congressmen to the naval bill when it was recently before the House for consideration, requesting that the President should call a naval disarmament congress of the nations without delay, so that it might be determined if some agreement could not be reached whereby each nation of especially great naval power should pledge its assent to a substantial reduction by it of its naval program and armaments, with the attendant relief from a vast burden of taxation and cost from the backs of the people.

In spite of the fact that such appropriation bill carried over $400,000,000 for the next fiscal year, the majority party succeeded in preventing consideration of all but one of such amendments through points of order, and then voted down the only amendment allowed to come before the House for its consideration.

In the Senate, however, Senator BORAH, who offered an amendment substantially similar, but of a more limited nature, authorizing and requesting the President to invite the Governments of Great Britain and Japan to a disarmament congress for the mutual reduction of armament, was more fortunate and secured the adoption of his amendment by the Senate. This amendment, as you know, the conferees of both the House and Senate have finally agreed to report back to the House of Representatives for adoption or rejection, and I sincerely hope that the Democratic support which it will receive will be increased by enough Republican votes to insure its passage.

It is worthy of special attention that any effort to hold down increases in the already vast appropriations for armaments and the machinery of war encounters a most desperate resistance in Congress, even though the United States has the greatest available number of trained fighting men of any nation on earth, most of whom are veterans of the World War, who have returned to peace-time pursuits.

I believe that the American people expect Congress to adequately provide for the defense and protection of the Nation, both on land and sea; but I do not believe that the people will sanction vast expenditures designed only to build up a vast war machine, the only effect of which will be to ultimately crush the people with its staggering cost.

But even though there are those who still insist upon the policy of postponing a conference of the nations to bring about an agreement on disarmament even to a limited extent, and propose to continue the great armament expenditures under which the Nation now labors, which conservatively figured, and including expenses incident to wars, amounts to 80 per cent of all our national expenditures, yet I insist that the producers of this country ought then to have even a greater right to all possible encouragement and assistance by the Government through the farm loan banks and other agencies to obtain adequate credit, so that they may continue to produce the raw materials and products of the farm upon which the Nation depends for both food and raiment, and make possible the continuance of our industries as well as our domestic and foreign trade. Nations, like individuals, must produce and earn in order to pay their debts.

It must be apparent, also, to every one that not only is there necessity for advancements of loans for the benefit of producers in line with the purpose of this bill, but that beyond that, and of transcendant importance, is the necessity for the development especially of foreign markets for the surplus crops and supplies of this Nation.

There is no question but what the demand therefor exists in the highest degree, especially among the countries of Europe, but it is also obvious that those nations are in such serious financial difficulties that it is becoming increasingly difficult all the time for them to finance the purchases of American commodities which they desire to make. Not only their vast expenditures and losses growing out of the war contributed to their present financial condition, but the unstable political and governmental conditions have also played and continue to play a large part in preventing early financial recovery. The depreciation in the value of the money of such nations has, of course, reduced their purchasing power tremendously; and even at the greatly reduced prices of American farm and other products the depreciation in the value of their money is so great that it is yet impossible for such nations to purchase anything like the amount of American supplies which they so badly need. Although many of the policies pursued by you gentlemen of the majority party do not seem to have been formed and followed with a full appreciation of the present threatening economic situation, yet it does appear to have been grasped by the Comptroller of the Currency, Hon. D. R. Crissinger, who, in a recent address before the New York Bankers' Association, said:

> We need to increase our exports, but in our new quality as a great creditor country we find it more difficult than ever to export more than we import. The difficulty is increased by the fact that our money is the best in the world—the most expensive. On a gold basis 5 Italian lire would buy a dollar's worth of goods from us. But the lira is so depreciated that it takes more, nearly 20 now, to buy a dollar. Naturally the Italian wants to buy in a market where he gets more for his money; and our money being at the top of the entire heap, they are all trying to get things somewhere else rather than from us.

The facts appear to justify the conclusion of the Comptroller that foreign nations "are all trying to get things somewhere else rather than from us." Of course, there are certain commodities, like cotton, which foreign nations must have which are not raised in sufficient quantity elsewhere to enable them to secure a supply, and hence they are bound to buy from us or do without. But even with respect to such commodities the decrease in purchases has been enormous.

The New York Times under date of June 12, 1921, called attention to the alarming decline in our foreign trade, and the statement is of such interest that I feel it fully worth while to include it in my remarks:

GREAT DECLINE IN OUR FOREIGN TRADE—MAY IMPORTS DOWN $48,000,000 FROM APRIL AND $223,000,000 FROM MAY, 1920.

WASHINGTON, June 11.

The Department of Commerce made public to-day figures which show that the value of imports and exports dropped off radically during May of this year as compared with May, 1920. Both imports and exports decreased more than $1,000,000,000 for the 11 months ending with May, 1921, as compared with the same period in 1920. The following tables give the picture:

MAY.

Imports	$208,000,000	$431,004,944
Exports	330,000,000	745,523,223
Excess of exports	122,000,000	314,518,279

11 MONTHS ENDING MAY.

Imports	$3,471,876,268	$4,685,746,580
Exports	6,179,603,978	7,479,611,906
Excess of exports	2,707,727,690	2,793,865,326

The decrease in exports for the 11 months' period ending May, 1921, is shown to be $1,300,007,928 and the decrease in imports $1,213,870,292.

The department also presents detailed tables showing the value of exports and imports since July, 1918. The figures for exports from December, 1920, show the steady decline which has occurred since that time. They follow:

January, 1921	654,271,423
February, 1921	486,281,597
March, 1921	386,680,346
April, 1921	340,338,729
May, 1921	330,000,000

The change in import figures has not been so startling. In December, 1920, the value was put at $206,057,443. For the following months the valuations were: January, $208,796,989; February, $214,529,680; March, $251,969,241; April, 254,597,362; May, $207,000,000.

Statistics for the imports and exports of gold show that for the 11 months ending May, 1921, imports were $602,817,925, as compared with exports of only $132,764,299, the increase of imports over exports being $470,053,626.

For the 11 months ended May, 1920, imports of gold were only $123,775,217, as compared with exports of $461,100,731, showing an excess of exports over imports of $337,325,514.

Imports of gold for the 11 months' period ending May, 1921, showed an increase, as compared with the exports for the corresponding period in 1920, of $479,042,708, and the exports for 1921, as compared with 1920, showed a decrease of $828,336,432.

Imports of gold for May, 1921, were $58,209,918, as compared with $15,687,859 for May, 1920. Exports were only $1,062,521 in May, 1921, as compared with $7,561,683 in May, 1920.

The great influx of gold into the United States began in October, 1920, when gold imports reached $116,762,001. For the following months the import figures were:

October, 1920	$116,762,001
November, 1920	56,889,037
December, 1920	44,660,488
January, 1921	38,145,001
February, 1921	44,238,147
March, 1921	87,371,598
April, 1921	92,236,175
May, 1921	58,209,918

Imports of silver for the 11 months ended May, 1921, were $55,805,359, as compared with $96,337,935 for the same period in 1920. Exports fell off sharply, however, dropping to $51,112,161 as compared with $174,621,640 during the 11 months' period in 1920. The imports of silver, therefore, showed an excess over exports of $4,693,198, as compared with an excess of exports for the same period in 1920 of $78,283,711.

The country's foreign trade in merchandise in May compares with the preceding month and with the same month last year as follows:

	May, 1921.	April, 1921.	May, 1920.
Exports	$330,000,000	$339,914,987	$745,868,402
Imports	208,000,000	254,571,024	431,001,555
Excess exports	122,000,000	85,343,963	314,863,846

The May results compare with preceding months of 1921 and 1920 as follows:

	Exports.	Imports.	Excess exports.
May, 1921	$330,000,000	$208,000,000	$122,000,000
April, 1921	339,914,987	254,571,024	85,343,963
March, 1921	386,811,138	251,988,741	134,822,397
February, 1921	489,297,067	214,525,137	274,771,930
January, 1921	654,740,158	208,814,382	445,925,776
December, 1920	720,852,515	266,112,819	454,739,696
November, 1920	676,703,011	321,181,080	355,524,931
October, 1920	751,728,570	334,263,803	417,464,767
September, 1920	605,291,257	363,666,710	241,624,547
August, 1920	579,052,607	513,550,615	65,501,992
July, 1920	651,381,827	537,170,351	114,211,476
June, 1920	631,082,648	552,975,088	78,207,560

Export and import trade in merchandise for the 11 months ended with May, 1921, compare with the same period in a series of years (000 omitted):

	Exports.	Imports.	Excess exports.
1921	$6,180,000	$3,472,000	$2,708,000
1920	7,480,761	4,685,746	2,795,015
1919	6,304,419	2,802,804	3,501,615
1918	5,435,911	2,685,305	2,750,606
1917	5,720,026	2,352,701	3,367,325
1916	3,868,796	1,952,088	1,916,708
1915	2,500,041	1,516,474	983,567
1914	2,207,507	1,736,454	471,052
1913	2,302,479	1,681,762	620,716

The May trade in gold compares as follows with the preceding month and with the same month last year:

	May, 1921.	April, 1921.	May, 1920.
Imports	58,209,918	88,143,275	15,687,859

It will be noted from such statement that the decrease in exports for the 11 months' period ending May, 1921, is shown to be the vast sum of $1,300,007,928, and a decrease in imports during such period of $1,213,870,292. These figures illustrate in a most illuminating way how dependent the success of our export trade is upon being able to effect exchanges for needed commodities of other nations, when they have neither money nor credit with which to buy our goods. It harkens back to the period of elemental trade, upon which, after all, the whole fabric of commerce rests.

The existing situation is even more concretely illustrated by the report of the Census Bureau on June 15, 1921, with reference to the domestic consumption of cotton and exports thereof, which I present herewith for your consideration.

[1] Figures include 4,340 bales of linters exported during May in 1921 and 5,550 bales in 1920 and 41,415 bales for the 10 months ending May 31 in 1921 and 45,686 bales in 1920. The distribution for May, 1921, is as follows: United Kingdom, 9; France, 366; Germany, 1,425; Netherlands, 1,272; Canada, 1,213; Mexico, 50; Cuba, 5.

World statistics: The world's production of commercial cotton, exclusive of linters, grown in 1920, as compiled from published reports, documents, and correspondence, was approximately 19,830,000 bales of 500 pounds net, while the consumption of cotton (exclusive of linters in the United States) for the year ending July 31, 1920, was approximately 18,451,000 bales of 500 pounds net. The total number of spinning cotton spindles, both active and idle, is about 154,600,000.

This report shows that the domestic consumption of cotton for the first 10 months of the cotton year beginning August 1, 1920, and ending May 31, 1921, was over 1,300,000 bales less than for the 10 months of the cotton year ending May 31, 1920, with about 400,000 bales less on hand this year in consuming establishments than last year.

It is also to be noted from such statement that the exports to Great Britain for the 10 months of this cotton year only amount to 1,515,047 bales as against 2,936,571 bales for the same period of the cotton year 1920, indicating a falling off of more than 1,400,000 bales in exports to Great Britain alone, with decreases of nearly 675,000 bales in exports to all other countries except Germany, which shows an increase of over 600,000 bales, leaving a net decline of nearly a million and a half bales.

Of course, this great decline in the consumption of cotton and other American products, both at home and abroad, has been reflected with unusual severity in the depression throughout the agricultural as well as industrial sections of our country. With our great crops and condition presented how could it be otherwise?

When it is remembered that the United States in the 10 months ending May 31, 1920, only consumed 5,339,090 bales, and for the 10 months ending May 31, 1921, only consumed 4,016,117 bales, and when it is further remembered that out of a production in the United States of 13,197,775 bales during the cotton year 1920–21, with a carry over of 3,563,000 bales from the previous year, 9,904,913 bales were still unconsumed on March 31, 1921, it is readily apparent that without foreign markets there must inevitably follow the greatest demoralization and depression in the price of the commodity as well as a tremendous resulting economic loss from the failure to make use of the staple.

It must be evident to all, therefore, particularly under prevailing conditions, that the more obstacles and burdens imposed upon foreign nations seeking to get into our markets and buy our products the greater will be the injury to our foreign commerce.

It seems too obvious for expression that to bring about any substantial relief from the existing depression there must be not only proper credit facilities for the farmer and better marketing facilities for his agricultural products, but it is further absolutely indispensable that markets not only at home but also abroad shall be kept open and further developed for the absorption and purchase of American raw and finished materials. We can not consume all that we produce, and unless we refuse to grow we are bound to encounter, without foreign markets, continued stagnation of industry at home.

Before the World War the Central Powers were among the greatest consumers of our raw material, especially cotton; but with the defeat of Germany and Austria in that momentous contest, and their financial collapse, there has followed a vast war debt to the Allies, for the payment of which practically all the assets of the Central Powers have been pledged and mortgaged.

The vast reparation sum which Germany has been called upon and has agreed to pay is, under the terms of the Versailles treaty, made a preference lien upon all her assets and revenues.

Article 235 of the treaty provides as follows:

In order to enable the allied and associated powers to proceed at once to the restoration of their industrial and economic life, pending the full determination of their claims, Germany shall pay in such installments and in such manner (whether in gold, commodities, ships, securities, or otherwise) as the reparation commission may fix, during 1919, 1920, and the first four months of 1921, the equivalent of 20,000,000,000 gold marks. Out of this sum the expenses of the armies of occupation subsequent to the armistice of November 11, 1918, shall first be met, and such supplies of food and raw materials as may be judged by the Governments of the principal allied and associated powers to be essential to enable Germany to meet her obligations for reparation may also, with the approval of the said Governments, be paid for out of the above sum. The balance shall be reckoned toward liquidation of the amounts due for reparation. Germany shall further deposit bonds as prescribed in paragraph 12 (c) of Annex II hereto.

Article 248 of the treaty provides:

Subject to such exceptions as the Reparation Commission may approve, a first charge upon all the assets and revenues of the German Empire and its constituent States shall be the cost of reparation and all other costs arising under the present treaty or any treaties or agreements supplementary thereto or under arrangements concluded between Germany and the allied and associated powers during the armistice or its extensions.

Up to May 1, 1921, the German Government shall not export or dispose of, and shall forbid the export or disposal of, gold without the previous approval of the allied and associated powers acting through the Reparation Commission.

Article 251 of the treaty provides:

The priority of the charges established by article 248 shall, subject to the qualifications made below, be as follows:

(a) The cost of the armies of occupation as defined under article 249 during the armistice and its extensions;

(b) The cost of any armies of occupation as defined under article 249 after the coming into force of the present treaty;

(c) The cost of reparation arising out of the present treaty or any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto; and

(d) The cost of all other obligations incumbent on Germany under the armistice conventions or under this treaty or any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto.

The payment for such supplies of food and raw material for Germany and such other payments as may be judged by the allied and associated powers to be essential to enable Germany to meet her obligations in respect of reparation will have priority to the extent and upon the conditions which have been or may be determined by the Governments of the said powers.

It will be noted from the last paragraph that the payment for such supplies of food and raw materials to Germany may, under certain conditions, be given priority rights even over reparation claims; but in order to obtain such preference, it is stipulated that it shall be deemed in the judgment of the "allied and associated powers to be essential to enable Germany to meet her obligations in respect of reparation."

It has been my purpose to endeavor to secure for the producers of my district, as well as my State and Nation, the benefits of the provisions of the Versailles treaty as relate to preference payment by Germany for supplies of food and raw material. To this end, notwithstanding that the Senate had refused to ratify the Versailles treaty, I took the matter up with President Harding and the Secretary of State, Hon. Charles E. Hughes, to enlist, if possible, the aid of this Government in obtaining for American producers the benefit of such priorities provided for in the treaty.

Secretary Hughes at first declined to enter into any negotiations whatever with the Allies concerning this matter, but suggested that there would be no objection to my constituents individually taking the matter up with the Reparation Commission, as reflected in his letter to me of May 3, 1921, which reads:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 3, 1921.

The Hon. CLAY STONE BRIGGS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of April 14, 1921, by reference from the White House, together with its inclosures relative to a proposed plan whereby payments for shipments of cotton to Germany may be granted priority over reparation payments.

According to articles 235 and 251 of the treaty of Versailles, the allied and associated powers are authorized, in their discretion, to grant certain priorities for the purchase of food and raw materials by Germany. Since this Government has not ratified the treaty of Versailles, no opinion can be expressed in regard to the interpretation of these two articles by those allied Governments which have become parties to the treaty. It is suggested that it might be desirable for your constituents to approach the Reparation Commission and ascertain whether priorities, as outlined in the inclosures with your letter, might be approved.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Of course, the Reparation Commission could seldom be successfully or readily approached by private individuals, as the commission is really constituted of official representatives of the allied Governments, who prefer to deal with officials of the United States.

Afterwards President Harding named an American representative upon the Reparation Commission, and I then again presented the matter to the Secretary of State, with a view to enlisting the assistance of the American delegate and State Department in securing priority payments for purchases from America. This time I met with better success, and on June 9, 1921, the Secretary of State wrote me as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 9, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. BRIGGS: I have received your letter of May 24, 1921, in confirmation of our conference, in which you inquire whether the Reparation Commission would permit payments for American products to take priority over the reparation claims of the Allies.

The question you raised was taken up with the unofficial American delegate on the Reparation Commission, and I take pleasure in submitting for your information a paraphrase of the pertinent portions of his reply:

"It will be desirable for application to be made by German Government. The proposition should be as definite and complete as possible, and no special forms of application are required. It would also be wise to acquaint the American delegation on the Reparation Commission with the full details of the proposition, as this would permit the delegation to make suggestions. Anything it might do, however, would merely be in the form of friendly assistance and would not involve governmental responsibility. Assistance would also be conditional upon the plan seeming to be equitable. Any request for priority must meet the terms of article 251 of the treaty of Versailles, and it should be especially noted that such priorities must enable Germany to meet reparation obligations.

"The application should be supported by a letter from the American interests, tactfully pointing out the difficulty of granting credit to Germany without obtaining certain priorities. Purchases of food and raw materials by Germany have thus far been made without obtaining in advance the approval of the Reparation Commission."

Trusting that this information will be of value to you and to your constituents, I am, my dear Mr. BRIGGS,

Sincerely, yours,
CHARLES E. HUGHES.

It will thus be seen that upon compliance with the procedure indicated the American exporter and producer is now able to at least obtain some assistance from the American Government, if only in an informal way, to establish and secure the opportunity for developing a much greater trade with Germany than could otherwise have been arranged, upon a satisfactory basis for payment for purchases made.

And so I hope that the American producer and farmer is soon going to be relieved in a substantial way from the distressing adversity which has overtaken him since the war, and that not only will this bill pass and provide him with credit facilities at least to the extent of some of his needs, so that he may continue to produce and maintain his farm, but that the Congress of the United States and the party in power will develop a greater interest in preserving, stimulating, and developing our foreign trade by the encouragement and development of expanded and new markets, so that this Nation may continue to grow, and those who have made it the greatest agricultural country in the world be enabled to survive and prosper. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. How much time have I left now, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Forty-six minutes.

Mr. WINGO. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment this is not any special favor to the farmers of this country. It is their right under the bill that we have heretofore passed. A separate and distinct banking system was established by the American Congress to aid the agricultural interests. Owing to an abnormal condition that now exists, their securities can not be sold readily. This Congress is called on to see that that system functions properly, and that is what this resolution is attempting to do.

I am sorry that the House committee saw fit to cut down the $50,000,000 that the Senate put through to $25,000,000, but if that is to be final, I am for that. I feel it should be $100,000,000. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], with tears falling upon his cheeks, said that the Government was unable to do this. The agricultural interests of the United States are almost prostrate because of conditions that we know have brought their produce to almost nothing. As the gentleman from Illinois stated, every man who has an ounce of sense knows that the Federal Reserve Board and the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States last fall virtually reduced the farmers' produce to half what it was worth. Whether they were justified or not, it was done. Of course I do not think they were justified in making the farmer the goat. It was necessary that something be done to bring this country from the awfully inflated condition in which it was; but why did they start with the farmer and cut him off at his knees as the first one? The American Congress is called on to see that some aid is given to this Federal farm loan banking system in order that the farmers may continue to borrow money while many of them are forced to hold their produce.

And yet the gentleman from New Jersey who, I believe, voted $2,000,000,000 for the railroads taken out of the pockets of the people is standing up as the only man in the House saying that the Government is not able to let the farmers of the United States have—not a gift—but to have a loan at 5½ per cent. While he votes $300,000,000 and $400,000,000 for the Army and $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 for the Navy, he says this Government can not lend $25,000,000 as a revolving fund to the farmers of the United States. It would be a pitiable condition in the United States if such a sentiment prevailed in the minds of a majority of this Congress, as was advanced by the gentleman from New Jersey here to-day. The backbone of the whole country would be destroyed. Up in his district the spinning wheels would cease to hum, the engines would stop, and the smokestacks would rust if the farmers of the United States had to stop producing. [Applause.] And yet by his vote and his speech he is willing to see the cessation of the farmers' loan banking system when he knows that the farmers can not go to a State or Federal bank and get a loan for over four or six months. He knows that they must have a long-time loan in order to improve their farms and restock them after this horrible experience that they passed through last year. He knows, or if he does not know, he should go to the magazines and study and see that the farmers must have this farm bank system in operation all the time.

The farmers were not responsible for the Federal courts tying up the system and keeping them from getting the money that they were entitled to by this system. The Supreme Court decided that they could open up and begin operations again, and we are duty bound now to give them further assistance. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I intend to support this measure, but I think there should be two amendments to it. In the first place, instead of making it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury whether the funds should be deposited with the farm loan banks it should be made mandatory. I think a great deal of the trouble that has existed in this country in the last few months has been by virtue of the discretion lodged in those who control the financial credits of the country. We were permitted to go along as a people engaged in all kinds of speculation until the currency of the country became inflated, until perhaps it was necessary to have some sort of a halt. But it was done with all of the suddenness of a flash of lightning and without warning. If a man were up in a 10-story building, there would be two ways to get down; one would be to come down the steps and the other to jump out of the window. Financially speaking we jumped out of the window. By virtue of the graduated rediscount rates that were put on suddenly the country almost went to smash. I submit that if it was necessary to put graduated rates on the banking system of the country, on the money people desire to borrow, it should have been put up gradually and there should have been notice given of the intention to put rediscount rates on a graduated scale into effect, and then the country could have adjusted itself and been prepared to meet conditions that existed.

This bill gives the Secretary of the Treasury discretionary power to deposit this small amount of money, pitiably small, with those in charge of the farm loans of this country.

Under the provisions of this bill he can practically withdraw that at any time, and it is made his duty to do so. The people who are engaged in agriculture in this country are face to face with problems that are real and not fanciful. It is a condition and not a theory. If the time ever comes when the people who produce the elemental wealth of this country fail to function the whole country will go on the rocks. If basic production fails your industrial smokestacks will rust in idleness. That probably is too plain to be discussed. Therefore I say that the Nation can well afford to say to the Secretary of the Treasury, you shall deposit funds so that they may use them in relieving the distressed condition of agriculture at the present time.

The language of this bill makes it perfectly safe to do so. There is no better security on the face of the earth than that which will be back of the securities that are deposited here. Why should it be limited to the sum here specified? That is a mere drop in the bucket. Why should not an amendment be offered to make it a sufficient amount to furnish real relief? I believe it ought to be offered, and I believe it ought to be passed and made mandatory. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. During the debate much has been said regarding inflation and deflation of prices on farm products. We have heard much about the condition of the farmer and considerable criticism of the courts, the officers, and Federal reserve banks, the Federal Farm Loan Board, the special interests, and the unholy speculators. Each speaker seems to have little or no difficulty in fixing responsibility, at least satisfactory to himself, but no party accused admits guilt, and as we fail to agree among ourselves, no one has so far been convicted.

So far as I am personally concerned, I frankly admit that I am not so deeply concerned in the causes that have led up to the unhappy conditions surrounding the farmer as I am in the discovery and application of some method of relief.

If my home were on fire, I think I would first call the fire department, with a view of extinguishing the flames, before I consulted a detective for the purpose of discovering the origin of the fire.

The farmer is no fool; he knows his condition; everybody else knows it; and we all admit it. Most of the farmers can fix responsibility for present conditions; they do not care so much about your help concerning that as they do about remedial aid.

Some weeks ago, along with others, I appeared before the Federal Farm Loan Board in behalf of the farmers of my section. I then understood that the board favored the creation of a revolving fund of $50,000,000 for the purpose contemplated by this bill. We are informed that the Senate so understood and voted such an amount, but we are now told that $25,000,000 will satisfy the board, and hence the proposed bill provides such an amount.

In view of such information, I do not undertake to state what amount will satisfy the demands of the Federal Farm Loan Board, but I do know that such an amount will neither satisfy or meet the urgent demands of agriculture, and, so far as I am concerned, I will gladly vote to provide four times the amount authorized by this bill. Let us make it at least $50,000,000. We should enable the farmer to procure a loan on his real estate, the best security in the world. He can then pay the banker, buy goods from the merchant, and the country will prosper. His farm mortgages will be converted into bonds and sold in a few months. The Government will then be repaid with interest, without loss, and agricultural bankruptcy will be averted.

The Federal Government is not a pauper. Its gold reserve is steadily and rapidly increasing. I believe we now have about one-third of the gold reserve of the world. It is the richest Nation in existence, and yet its average farmer has been denied that simple and just relief which hurts no one, but, to the contrary, would better all, for when the farmer is prosperous the status of all is improved.

Everybody is hungry and the world is naked. The farmer has made plenty to feed and clothe them all, and yet prices of farm products have been so deflated that he can not meet his obligations.

In your Cummins-Esch bill you vote billions for the railroads. I did not. You guaranteed them 6 per cent, and authorized the raising of freight rates higher than the fabled cow that jumped over the moon. Now, what will you do for agriculture?

My experience since becoming a Member of this House is that we always have money for everything except the man who is engaged in tilling the soil. Everybody admits on both sides of the Chamber to-day that $50,000,000 would serve the desired purpose a great deal better than $25,000,000 provided by the terms of this bill. The statement of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] brings conclusive evidence to my mind that the Federal Government can furnish the Farm Loan Board $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 with about the same ease that it can finance the $25,000,000. Therefore, again stating my position, I am in favor of authorizing $50,000,000 at least. I want this committee and the membership of this House to function at this time so that the Federal Farm Loan Board can do so hereafter. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN].

Mr. MCSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, to increase the amount to $50,000,000 would be about the price of two great modern battleships. Although they might be necessary to the defense of the Nation, I submit that encouragement and assistance to agriculture is far more essential and dispensable to the preservation of this Nation, for the reason that it is not for the preservation of the agriculturists alone, but for the city population as well, because the farmers are not bound to continue to produce what we in the cities must eat and wear, unless they can do so at a profit. [Applause.]

While the battleships may be necessary for the life of the Nation, yet the prosperity of the farm population is always and essentially indispensable to the continued life of any nation. War may come or it may not come. If war does come, we certainly need some means of military defense. But whether war come frequently or whether war may be banished forever from the face of the earth, we must continue to live from the products of the farm. The point I wish to make is that the prosperity of the farmer is the first and perpetual line of national defense. And you will please note that I did not say the existence of a farm population is essential to our national life. I did not say that it is merely necessary that farmers should continue to raise crops, whether they do so at a profit or a loss. But I said, and I repeat for the purposes of emphasis, that our governmental, our financial, and our economic system must be so adjusted that the farmers' business will be profitable. Why do I make bold to assert this? Simply because unless it is profitable for the farmer to go forth in winter's snows and summer's heat to care for the plants and the animals with all the tenderness of a father watching over his children, unless it pays him in dollars and cents to continue this work, he will stop it, and there is no way by which the necessary results can be obtained except on the basis of personal profit. The farm business can not be socialized. The farm business can not be conducted by a soviet. The farm business can not be operated by a commune. Farming is essentially and fundamentally individualistic. The work of the farmer is isolated. The life of the farmer is lonely. Since the farmer labors alone and lives alone, he naturally demands and requires that his bank account shall be his alone, and that his farm shall be held by him in fee simple, and he must have the assurance that the fruit trees and the nut-bearing trees planted by him and watched over by him through all the years shall be his during his declining years, and shall pass by operation of law to his children and, if he so desire, to his grandchildren.

Therefore the farmer must find that it pays him financially to raise his produce, to gather it, and to pack it, and to haul it to the transportation company to be carried to the market. Unless it pays the farmer, he would be foolish to waste his time and his strength in such labor. Therefore he would merely produce what is necessary for himself and his immediate family and he would allow the rest of the world to shift for itself.

Now, do not misunderstand me. The farmer is not asking to have his business subsidized by the Government, nor is it necessary that it should be subsidized. But it is necessary that the lawmakers in Congress and the lawmakers in the several State legislatures shall cooperate in reorganizing and reconstructing our economic, financial, and transportation systems, so that the farmer shall receive his reasonable and just proportion of every dollar's worth of merchandise that he raises and puts upon the market. I sometimes think that the millions grouped in our great cities who see their food for the first time when it is set before them on the table, and then in a condition entirely different from what it was when it left the farmer's field, that they fail to realize that everything the people eat does and must come from the farm. In like manner this is true of everything that the people wear, except it is usually more completely transformed by the processes of manufacture. It is a fact that it takes more than 60 cents out of every dollar's worth of produce to pay all the incidental expenses connected with the distribution of the food supplies of the Nation. So that the farmer, who employs his land, his implements, his stock, his labor, his time, his capital investment, his thought in planting, cultivating, gathering, packing, and hauling, receives only about one-third out of every dollar's worth of products. We are told that in Denmark conditions have been so improved that the farmer there receives about 80 cents out of every dollar's worth, instead of receiving only about 33 cents, as he does in this country.

A little reflection will show us that there has been an unjust and unwise distribution and division of the profits in this country. Look at our farms and see the modest houses, with few, if any, comforts and conveniences, and see the hard conditions under which the women and children are compelled to live and to labor throughout the entire year. On the contrary, look to the cities, with their towering buildings massed in mighty array, worth countless millions, and many individuals, merely because of occupying a strategic economic and financial position, taking their toll by the millions annually, and contributing very little to the actual material well-being of the Nation. Now, these cities have been built and many of their population have grown rich out of commerce, and from commerce alone. Now, commerce is confined exclusively to the buying and selling and transportation of things that people eat and wear. Of course, the ornamental commodities are practically negligible. Therefore the cities have been built and some of their citizens have been enriched in fabulous figures by handling the things that the farmers produce.

Therefore I come back to the proposition that the farmer is not a mendicant. He is not begging to be pensioned. But he is demanding his rights, and he is insisting that we, who are legislating for the present and the future well-being of this Nation—which means all the people of this Nation, which includes not merely the farmer, the laborer, the merchant, and the banker, but includes the professional man, the teacher, and the preacher—the farmer demands that we, his public servants, shall do justice by changing the conditions that now exist.

And I respectfully submit that this demand is upon the legislators of this country, both National and State, and comes not alone from the farmer, but, upon second thought and in view of an enlightened self-interest, comes with increased emphasis from the teeming millions crowded in the cities. Why do I say this? Because unless the farmer produces a surplus above his own needs the people who live in the cities will have nothing to eat. The farmer will not produce this surplus unless he can do so at a profit. Therefore it is indispensable to the city population that things shall be so arranged that the farming business shall be profitable. You can not starve the farmer, because self-preservation would require him to produce enough for his own demands and for his loved ones. But if the transportation companies running into the great centers of population, like New York and Chicago, should cease for one short week to carry the trainloads of milk, of vegetables, of flour, of meat, of butter, and the thousands of commodities produced on the farm and consumed in the city, then, at the end of that short week, people in these cities would begin to starve, and at the end of a second week there would be riots and bloodshed, and in a few short weeks these mighty cities would be wrecks. The legislator who looks wisely and widely out over the country and into the future loves all the people of the Nation, both those in the city and those in the country. He wants to see all the people happy, and it is fundamentally essential that the people should have a reasonable supply of the material things to eat and to wear in order that they may be happy. It would certainly be a shortsighted policy that would say that it is a good thing for the cities to be able to buy wholesale farm products at the present sacrifice prices. So far the great slump in prices has helped the ultimate consumer in the city very little. Only this morning I learned in an interview in the Central Market of this city that lettuce is being bought in my State of South Carolina on the farm at about 50 cents a crate, and that the transportation charges to this city are $1.04 a crate. So that the lettuce costs the wholesale dealer here, including freight, less than 7 cents per head. But when it reached me later in a café one-half of a head cost me 30 cents. So that what the farmer received about 2 cents for I paid 60 cents for, and the railroad received twice as much for hauling the commodity for 20 hours as the farmer got, who planted and cultivated and cared for and gathered and packed and hauled, his labor continuing through many weeks.

It does not require a Solomon to see that there is something wrong when such conditions prevail. Of course, I admit that we of the public are partly to blame for being imposed on by a continuation of war-time prices in the retail trade. We pay the prices demanded of us without question and without complaint. It is but natural that the cafés and the hotels and the retail stores should continue to demand these prices so long as they can receive them. What the great unorganized and leaderless public ought to do is to refuse to buy at unreasonably high prices and to voice that demand by patronizing the places that begin to cut the prices. Last night I walked five blocks to get a shoe shine at 5 cents, because that is the first time I have enjoyed that privilege in over four years. I hope that shoe-shine stand will be constantly crowded until all the others come back to 5 cents. I would gladly walk several blocks to a restaurant that would cut its prices in something like a reasonable proportion to the farmer's prices. It is a fact that the farmer is getting only about 25 cents a dozen for his eggs and most of the restaurants are serving only two eggs for 25 cents, and I call that a profit of 600 per cent; and I submit that in the cooking of eggs there is the least labor involved of any commodity served in a café, other than milk. Eggs and milk should certainly follow, up and down, the wholesale prices. But it seems that the café prices are fixed at about 100 per cent profit on the maximum price for eggs, and when the wholesale price goes down, down, down the profits are multiplied 200, 300, 400, 500, and even 600 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, as a sort of personal protest against the continuation of unreasonably high retail prices, I continue to wear during this sweltering heat my winter clothes, including shoes and hat. You may therefore rightly divine that I am the Congressman elect who protested through the public press against the outrageous proposition advanced by the hotels of this city that they would increase their rates during inaugural week in March, 1921, from 200 to 300 per cent, and would require those desiring to reserve rooms for the inaugural ceremonies to guarantee to pay for the rooms for at least seven days and deposit a minimum of one-half of the charges for the whole seven days. I refused to engage at any such prices, and threatened to bring my tent and pitch it on some public park and to live in it, first, in self-defense, and, second, as an emphatic protest against such unreasonable and unconscionable demands. If hotels are to be crowded by a number of patrons, that would justify reducing the rates rather than raising them. It can not be more expensive per capita to entertain a few guests than it is to entertain 100 guests. If a hotel can exist and make profit on the basis of 100 guests, why could it not make a far greater profit when it crowds in 1,000 guests at the ordinary prices? Then, if the prices are to be doubled and trebled, where has conscience gone?

So, Mr. Chairman, if as a means of national defense we appropriate $330,000,000 for the Army, which will be spent and never come back, and if we are to appropriate $417,000,000 for the Navy, which is to be spent and never come back, except in the part spent for naval construction, then is it unreasonable to ask that $50,000,000 be invested by this Government with these farm-loan banks? Mark you, the money is not to be spent like the $750,000,000 on the Army and Navy.

The money is invested in the best securities of the world. It has been argued that when the law was enacted only $6,000,000 was fixed for this purpose in order to aid the farm loan banks to function. That is no test of the amount necessary. We must remember that was the beginning; that was a trial figure. We were starting in a new venture, and we knew that if experience showed that more money was necessary the amount could be increased. I submit that it is now shown that $50,000,000 is necessary, and therefore the $50,000,000 should be placed on deposit with these banks in order to strengthen their power, so that they may put a strong arm around the farmer and encourage him to go forth to his labors with the assurance that he shall receive a profit for the fruits of his labor. We are told that one-half of the money deposited in the banks of the country belongs to the farmers, but when they come to borrow money they have received only about one-seventh of the money invested by the banks. The farmers have $80,000,000,000 of capital invested in that fundamental and essential industry, and during the last year not only did they fail to receive any profits but have sustained incalculable losses, estimated at $7,000,000,000. Other industries during the same period had about $160,000,000,000 invested, and statistics show that they earned about 12 per cent on an average. And we are told that many banks in this country during the same period of time earned on an average 37 per cent merely for handling the machinery of commerce. It will be noted that the bank produces not a pound of meat nor of flour nor of cotton. It only assembles the little savings of many depositors and loans this money out upon ample security, and last year the banks in a certain section made more than one-third of their capital invested, while the farmers, who produced the things that fed the bankers and their families, did not make a single dollar but, on the contrary, sustained the tremendous loss of $7,000,000,000. It seems that Congress was very careful to see that the railroad investors should not lose any profits as an incident to the war, because Congress guaranteed dividends to the railroads. Who has guaranteed anything to the farmer, when he is the very basis, the very foundation, upon which the very life of all the people depends? I will tell you, gentlemen of the Congress, that it will require something more than superficial applications of legislative anodyne to correct this situation. We need not approach this matter in the spirit of mere pacification and a desire to put off and in the spirit of feeding on false promises. We must be candid with ourselves. We must seriously consider the fundamental questions involved. We must be frank and candid with our constituents and the whole country. We must face the situation as it is and let all the people know just what will be done and what must be done in order that this condition may not continue, because this continuation is bound to spell ultimate ruin. If such readjustment involves losses and suffering, it is better that they should come now than that maladjustment and mistreatment should put off the direful day of certain doom, when all shall face ruin. Therefore I think that we are modest in the demand, as one step—and, in fact, a small step—toward the proper and final readjustment of matters, in order to correct the evils that confront us, to place with these banks $50,000,000 without any loss to the Treasury or the taxpayers. Therefore I urge the Members to vote to increase the amount recommended by the committee and to stand by the amount fixed in the Senate bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARD].

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this bill will be a sad disappointment to the farmers of the country when they shall have ascertained, as they quickly will, that having been promised $50,000,000 by an enormous majority in the Senate, they are to be reduced to $25,000,000, great as their needs are, and as easy as the fulfillment of that promise would be. It has not been denied in this presence that the Government of the United States, instead of making it $25,000,000, could, without embarrassment to itself and with beautiful consistency to its favoritism to other interests, make it many times that amount. When the railroads of the country came to the Congress, embarrassed no more than the farming interests of this country are to-day, their relief approached a billion of dollars, and yet when the great agricultural interests of the country are asking for a temporary loan to relieve a condition that spreads itself all over the world, we find the committee reducing the small allowance the Senate makes of $50,000,000 by one-half. In answer to my question this morning the gentleman having the bill in charge said that I was correct, that only $25,000,000 would accrue under this bill, and that that amount would have to be repaid by each bank within 15 days after the floating of the loan. It is a disappointment, naturally, inevitably so, to the great agricultural interests of the country, that are so much in need of this relief.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us get down to business and facts and figures and review this proposition before us in the light of the history of the farm loan bank legislation which precedes it and the conditions giving rise to it and that followed its enactment. It begins with the early days of the extra session called by President Wilson, very soon after his first inauguration. The right of the Government to extend a supporting hand to the agricultural interests of the country under the Constitution and consistently with sound governmental policy was clear and beyond doubt to his wonderfully constructive mind and the need for it, much less acute then than now, was sufficiently clear to him and to those who "stood round him and felt his own great arm lean on them for support." Just as soon as the revision of the tariff, then represented by the Payne-Aldrich bill, and the construction of that great system of national finance, known as the Federal reserve system, was finished they sat to work with head, hand, and heart devoted to the common good to a degree, I believe, never excelled by any corps of public servants to build up this sound and beneficent structure of farm loan banks. Its purpose was simply to provide a means by which the farms of the country—not the farmers, sir, but the farms, be it ever remembered—could obtain for their enlargement and permanent improvement long-term loans at low rates of interest and easy terms of repayment, known in the parlance of finance as amortization. There was nothing paternalistic about this. Not the slightest tincture of socialism tainted it. Less paternalistic than the national banking system, then 60 years in existence. Much less paternalistic than the Post Office system, then 300 years old in the governments of the world. It was simply democratic governmental encouragement and support meted out to an unorganized, scattered, and divergent industry, universal in its scope and fundamental in its support of all the life, activity, and industry of the world. With its failure and its depression then, as now and always, commercial life in all its varied forms and phases trembled, tottered, and fell, progress was arrested, and happiness at an end. This was its justification. What was its necessity? Farming on a large scale and with large investments can no more operate upon a cash basis and avoid the use of loans and credits than can the other industries of the world.

No industry in all the history of the commercial world has ever, nor probably ever will, subsist upon a system and policy of cash purchases, sales, and payments. It would seem sufficient to class farming with the average industry in this particular, but natural conditions on which its success depends would justify a superior claim to a fair demand of credit to almost any other industry known to the business world. In the great cities of the country land-mortgage syndicates were operating with general approval, whose business was to offer money for loan on farm-land mortgages for the same use and purpose, of course, and for broader uses and purposes than those aimed at by the farm loan bank. Their rates of interest were often enormously high and frequently subject to the avaricious demands of those lenders, to which was added attorneys' fees and large incidental expenses. The terms of these loans were comparatively short, as goes without saying, at the will of the lender. Of all the industries in the world, Mr. Chairman, farming can least depend and afford to take chances upon short-term loans. Crops can only be counted and valued at the harvest. Other industries can, many of them, calculate with more or less assurance for future results. Other industries represent a more rapid turnover, but the farmer's profits or losses revolve with "the process of years"; less quickly retrieved, they are more lasting in their effects. To borrow, therefore, on one or even two years' time, he invites the serious possibility of a wife and family unsheltered from the storm. When not in touch with these larger syndicates of the cities by reason of living far out in the country and around the little towns and county seats and by reason of the smaller interests at his command and the longer loans he was compelled to make, he was still unable to use the credit system at the command of the "business men" of his community. The national banking system through all the years of its existence had practically prohibited loans on land mortgages for reasons not to be complained at from the standpoint of banking, and arising mainly out of the slowness of the farmer's harvest and his turnovers; but the reason from the standpoint of the bank being good made the condition no better from that of the farmer. The shocking condition confronted him that the collateral of his businessman neighbor was sufficient to support a liberal loan at the bank, inexpensive, ready, and convenient in its renewal, while his far-flung acres, yielding their abundance with the revolving seasons, were ignored and held unfit to lay the foundation of a credit at the counters of the world's treasury.

These facts, theories, and conditions confronted the Wilson administration on its advent to power, and most splendidly did it set about its task of meeting them. It was not so difficult to do, as we saw after it was done. What had been needed in the long and tollsome years gone by was not brain, not genius, for the Republican Party does not stand charged with this default, but, sir, it was a heart that had been needed, a heart in the right place; a heart that beats with sympathy for him who labors for his daily bread as well as for the upper classes of the human family who live by wit and by dint of calculation; a heart that could lift up its soul to the God who made it and say in sincerity and truth, in the language of Henry Clay, "I have no commiseration for princes; my sympathies are reserved for the great masses of mankind." Such was the heart of this man chosen by my party to lead this country out of the Egypt of financial bondage as evidently, it seems to me, as was Moses to lead the long-suffering children of Israel from the bondage of Pharaoh.

But, Mr. Chairman, my enthusiasm for the magnanimity of these accomplishments is leading me into digression. I can not well restrain it. I shall never think of this farm loan bank, of the cause that gave rise to it, of its origination and history, without suffering my enthusiasm to lead me dangerously near to the error of human adulation of him and those whose democracy and sense of justice brought it into existence. It was, in fact, the product of a principle long before at work in the hearts of many men represented by and embodied in the doctrines of the political party whose contentions and struggles brought this man and his supporters to the position of responsibility and duty, and which found in them only the common rewards and the natural fruits of the faithful.

What were its effects? They are fresh in memory. Farming at once took on new life. Prices of farm products waited not a month to start on their march for a higher and stronger mark. Smiles of confidence and trust, of relief and gratitude, took the place of frowns of dissatisfaction, and signals of approval hushed the voices of murmurings and complaints. With assurance and defiant confidence I assert it, that no piece of national legislation ever issued from the American Congress that received a larger measure of popular approval than this farm loan act. It was at once patronized with eagerness beyond the possibility of timely accommodation. Approximately $387,000,000 were loaned in the first three years of its existence. At once and upon its heels the great insurance and other investment companies of America went out, as they had never done before, in search of farm lands on which to loan their money. They competed, of necessity, with the terms and interest rates of the new bank. In the villages and hamlets of the country doors and entrances were ornamented with attractive signs, "Money to lend, easy terms, inquire within." Every day of its untrammeled existence marked its upward and onward progress and increasing prosperity, hope, and confidence of the farmers. Certainly the war and its inflations did their part, but I speak of the normal process of expansion and growth that grew out of the immediate use of this institution, and especially of the large measure of confidence it inspired.

No sooner had it attained opportunities of usefulness than it was assailed by a suit in the Federal courts which, at first not seriously regarded, soon assumed most dangerous proportions by reason of the long delay in its determination and especially the call of the court for a reargument. This locked its doors for more than a year and until this present hour. Hard upon its closing came contraction and deflation of the credits of the business world, then running rampant in their wild rush for conquest and world absorption. This was the psychological moment when the farm loan bank was most needed and certainly would have done its greatest good. The farmer who had seen the market for his crop, that had been made at inflation prices of expense, closed as tight as a clamshell, had nowhere to look for a loan and no avenue open for approach to the indulgence of his creditors, was forced to dump this crop on an unwilling and depressed market and stand aghast at the "wreck of fortune and the crush of worlds" around about him. To say or pretend that any other industry suffered in equal degree is to assert an obvious incorrectness. If men think so, it is only because the farmer's sufferings are farthest away from touch with him, or else his sensibilities are less responsive to his sufferings.

What is the next step in this history of tragedy, Mr. Chairman? It is the induction of a new political administration, assuming power March 4, 1921, arrogant and exalted with power, exuberant in promises, magnanimous with grace, oppressed with wisdom, mighty to save. The farmers' emergency was the object assigned for an extraordinary session of the Congress. An emergency tariff bill is the first loop. It gives him a tariff duty on his own wheat and cotton which he ships abroad and charges him one on his medicines and his hardware and other things he buys. It is something in name, nothing in substance, working delusion, falsehood, and fraud.

About the time of the convening of this Congress this lawsuit was ended and the farm loan bank unmanacled. Immediately it went to work to get about the distribution of its bounties again. The first requirement was a bond sale of, I think, $40,000,000. Many unavoidable causes contributed to its difficulties. Its officers saw the need of expansion of credits and enlargement of means. It asked for $50,000,000 to be deposited by the Treasury to its credit for support of the bond issue and strengthening of its general activities. This is called a revolving fund, because of its recurrent use and application as a basis of credit and its ready adaptability to incidental and recurrent needs of expansion and contraction. It is required as its basis of credit on which to float its bonds.

Just here let it be distinctly understood that it is not a gift by the Treasury and amounts to no more than a well-secured loan or guaranty of credit. The money of the Public Treasury could not be given to this purpose under the Constitution. If it was an appropriation, every lawyer with a rag of his gown on his back knows it would be inhibited by the Constitution. We have now reached, in our narrative, the 17th day of May, 1921. Senator CURTIS introduced a bill in the Senate after conference with the bank commissioners—this I have from them. Here follows the bill. I read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 32 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 32. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, upon the request of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to make deposits for the temporary use of any Federal land bank, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Such Federal land bank shall issue to the Secretary of the Treasury a certificate of indebtedness for any such deposit, bearing a rate of interest not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the last bond issue of the bank receiving such deposit, to be secured by farm loan bonds or other collateral, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Any such certificate shall be redeemed and paid by such land bank at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The aggregate of all sums so deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed the sum of $50,000,000 at any one time."

On the 2d day of June this bill passed the Senate and was referred in the House to the Committee on Banking and Currency. This committee held hearings and here is its work. Striking out every word of the Senate bill, it substitutes the following:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 32 of the Federal farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916, as amended, is hereby amended by adding, after the first paragraph, a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"Until such time as the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks shall be $50,000,000, or more, the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, make deposits in addition to those authorized by the preceding paragraph, to be secured, redeemed, and paid in the same manner as provided in such paragraph, except that any additional deposit made hereunder shall be called by the Secretary of the Treasury and redeemed by the bank or banks holding the same within 15 days after the conclusion of each general offering of farm loan bonds by such bank or banks. The aggregate of such additional deposits outstanding at any time shall not exceed the difference between the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks on the last day of the preceding month and the sum of $50,000,000. The certificates of indebtedness issued to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Federal land bank for such additional deposits shall bear a rate of interest not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the last bond issue of the land bank receiving such deposits."

Note the fact that the Senate bill puts $50,000,000 at the disposal of this bank. The bank pays the Government one-half of 1 per cent interest in excess of the rate borne by the last issue, secured by farm loan bonds or other collateral to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, take up the language of this bill about to be passed by this House. Never can any loan be made after the capital stock of all the banks aggregated reaches $50,000,000; until then the difference between paid-in stock on the last day of the preceding month and $50,000,000. This paid-in stock is approximately $25,000,000 now. The difference between this and $50,000,000 is $25,000,000. So that we have it that this deposit is reduced one-half.

Mr. Chairman, in the early stages of this debate an affable, genial gentleman of the Republican side, standing in front of the Speaker's desk, put his hands affectionately upon my shoulders and said:

> WARD, why do not you gentlemen be open, candid, and consistent, and ask for a billion and be done with it? Just scoop it all right out and be done with it.

This showed candidly the understanding of gentlemen of that side of the House of this measure, and I quote it to show the enormity of their error. It is not scooping money out of the Treasury. It is not hurtful to the Treasury. The Treasury can more than double this support, as has been shown in this debate. The gold reserve is unusually strong and increasing. The Government is depositing more money than this Senate bill calls for—more than this bank asks for—without a cent interest in private institutions whose millions are being increased by its use. Let us make now a comparison of Government bounties, as I attempted in the beginning. One year or little more ago the railroads of this country found themselves in an embarrassment, which I confidently assert was not more acute than that in which the agricultural industry finds itself to-day. I could contend that the calamities that fell upon the farmers in October, 1920, were heavier and more destructive than those that confronted the railroads 13 months ago, but controversy will arise on the point to no purpose, and I content myself with a statement of the equality of these difficulties. I next humbly, meekly, and hoping not to offend, assert that the farms of the world are worth as much to it as the railroads. I next suggest with timid hesitation that, having been made by the same Creator, who of "one blood made all peoples for to dwell on the face of His earth," the owners of those farms will, in the great crucible of human destiny and of divine economy, be found by a prayerful test to be nearly as good, valuable, and worthy of consideration as those who own and operate railroads. Having said so much, with due apologies, I remind you that when the Esch-Cummins bill came before this House for and on the demand of the railroads the scooping process went to the extent of more than twelve times what is asked by the farmers in this bill. Their total money value does not exceed $14,000,000,000.

The farmers of this country are valued in billions, rolling incomparably above these figures, as everybody knows. For their relief in their hours of darkness the railroads were guaranteed 6 per cent profit on their own statements of their total valuation. Honest and intelligent controversy rages to-day around the question of the real amount of that value, differing to the extent of $7,000,000,000. But as it was not possible to settle that question at the time of the bounty, the railroads got from the Government its guaranty of 6 per cent on nineteen billions of capital, and right liberally and surely did the Government redeem its covenant with the elect. What is the cause of this difference in the degree of consideration extended by Congress as between farmers and railroads? I hear the snarl and see the sneer and the impotent charge of demagogy always substituted for answer and argument when one would raise a voice against the unlimited privilege of the strong aggregation of wealth and the operators of financial power.

But I will not "sit in the seat of the scornful" nor "walk in the counsel of the ungodly," and turning with honest and fearless conscience and defiance from the sneer I see the truth and I dare maintain it. It is because men who own, sell, deal in, and speculate in and with railroad bonds and stocks and those who attain the proud eminence of railroad mastership and operation are favorites in the councils of the political party now dominant in this House, as against those who follow the plow handles. This is truth, and God knows it, and you know it, and there is no other honest explanation of the matter.

Your pretensions of affection for the farmer are camouflage, cant, and mockery. Most unfortunately, the discrimination is more or less general in all the councils of Government by whatever political party those councils are controlled, by reason of stronger and better activities of the lobby, not alone at the seat of government but in the councils of party conventions where policies are originated and plans set on foot.

The Member that will make this statement from his place in this Chamber other than in good faith and without honest conviction and reasonable facts on which to base it is hardly worthy a seat here or to wear any other badge of public trust and confidence.

It is calculated to excite dissensions and strife and unpatriotic sentiments in the public mind. If any class of the people are at a disadvantage as against another class in the councils of government, it is the natural germ of anarchy and of revolution, and no man of character and patriotism will make it lightly and unwittingly. But it is time that we set the household of government right, and that strongly and promptly, and truthful discussion and candid statements of the facts are simply necessary to that end.

Equality of opportunity to all classes of citizenship is the very first essential of efficient and wholesome government. American socialism is the rising, growing protest against this favoritism here in this country, and for one I admit I entertain fears of its extension. There is no place in America for socialism, and ought to be no excuse for its existence, but class preference is the ground of its existence and the stimulus of its growth.

The only answer I have heard to my charge of great discrimination between the railroads and the farm loan bank is that the commissioners of the bank are getting by this House bill all they ask for. This was made by the honorable Member from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] in his answer to me earlier in the debate. I do not question Judge STRONG's honesty of opinion nor that of any other Member here, but it is singular, sir—indeed, it is an indictment against those commissioners—that if they only wanted and needed twenty-five millions they permitted the Senate to make it fifty millions without signifying their acceptance and willingness to accept half that amount.

Let us examine this phase of the House substitute and reread these words:

> Any additional deposit made hereunder shall be called by the Secretary of the Treasury and redeemed by the bank within 15 days after the conclusion of each general offering of farm loan bond—

And so forth.

Why this hurried redemption, Mr. Chairman, if not to embarrass the bank? In the name of justice and American business custom, why 15 days instead of 30 at the least? Why not leave that to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury? Thirty days is as short a period as bank notes are ever taken in general practice. Thirty days is reckoned cash even in grocery stores and barber shops. Yet these banks must pay back in 15 days. But, sir, I have reasons most compelling to believe the contrary as to the satisfaction of the officers of the bank. I know this, sir, and without hesitation and with no breach of confidence or betrayal of secret, I assert it; they expected fifty million, and told me in person they would get it, in their opinion. This in their office in May, 1921.

No wonder they expressed willingness and satisfaction in the councils of the House committee. They were not in position to demand; they were beggars at the table of Dives, and easily sustained and soothed by his broken loaves and crumbs. But apart from their humility and modesty at your board, I believe and, speaking for myself, maintain that twenty-five million is insufficient. Contrasting again with much regret the spectacle of the railroad representative at the door of Congress in May, 1920, when the Esch-Cummins bill was under consideration, it presents a parallel to the scene of the "younger son" in St. Luke's Gospel—"Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me, and be divided unto them his living." Opposite to this demand—this division of "his living"—I see in imagination Mr. Lever at the conference table of this committee reciting the pathetic words of the school-reader poem of my childhood:

> Give me three grains of corn, mother, only three grains of corn;
> It will save the little life I have 'til the coming of morn.

Mr. Chairman, if the Democratic Party was in control of this House, the Senate bill would pass unmodified, as surely as I live to-day. The probabilities are its beneficences would be increased. That party is proud of this farm-loan bank as its master stroke of handicraft, its strongest evidence of equality of justice meted out to all the people. It is devoted to it as Jacob was to Joseph, and the analogy may be carried further, for it was to Joseph he went to buy corn. It was Joseph who provided against famine and laid up in store the bounties of the soil to feed the hungry when the clouds failed to "return after the rain," and there were no markets as is now the case. The men who till the soil must go back to this Joseph of the Democratic Party to get their relief. Let them awake now and return. Justice and equality await them. God speed the day of their awakening and give them a rapid and peaceful journey. When

I say this action of this House will be disappointing I am putting it mildly. It will be simply crushing in its discouragement, and most righteously and emphatically will it be resented.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY].

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me most urgent that this bill be amended to carry at least $50,000,000. When Congress has already appropriated three-quarters of a billion for the current expense and construction program of the Army and Navy and a still larger sum for the railroads, this $50,000,000, even though it will represent a much larger amount when extended as credit, looks pitiful and niggardly.

Our obligations to the farmers are very similar to our obligations to the railroads. Gentlemen say that the railroads were a necessity to winning the war and are now an absolute necessity to our return to "normalcy," that the railroads must be "enabled to function" and must be "kept functioning," if our people are to be fed and clothed. These statements are true of the railroads, but they are just as true of the farmers. The farmers must produce before the railroads can distribute. During the war the farmers lined up as patriotically and efficiently as did the railroads—for that matter as did the boys in uniform themselves. They obeyed orders, not because they were compelled to, but because they wanted to. They planted food and feed crops according to instructions; they kept the meatless, wheatless, and sweetless days; they bought bonds and contributed in the drives; in every way they met the demands of a self-sacrificing and consecrated patriotism.

You say that our Army and Navy have been our protection in the past and must be our protection in the future. Grant it! The good and progressive farmer who is helping to lead the forces of production and provide the materials for feeding and clothing our people and the people of this distressed old world is as much a force for protection as a gold-braided admiral or a silver-starred general, though I disparage neither of the latter.

Have our industries suffered as an aftermath of the war? So have our farmers, and from exactly the same causes. Have our railroads lost one, two, or three billion dollars? Our farmers last year lost $7,000,000,000. And in the face of that staggering loss the farmers of my district, at least, have entered the new year under most discouraging conditions. A late and wet spring was followed by a month of torrid drought. In some places 80 per cent of the seed is said to have rotted in the ground. And these same farmers have to bear the weight of high taxes, high tariffs, and high freight rates.

Gentlemen, we have been working at the wrong end of the problem. We have tried to open up our factories by protecting them from an imagined competition with Europe. We have tried to load our 500,000 idle freight cars by voting money to their owners. We have failed to take account of the fact that of the retail price of a cabbage the merchant gets 76 per cent, the railroad 19 per cent, and the producer only 5 per cent. We have tried to build a heavy guilded arch on a sand foundation and have wondered why the structure sags.

As I stand before you, Mr. Chairman, this Nation, not as a matter of sentiment but as a matter of hard, cold, finance, owes no greater obligation than to its farmers. We must avoid paternalism as we would avoid national ruin, but we must wisely and effectively help the farmer to help himself. We must not sap his strength by leading him to look to the Government for that which he might do for himself, but we must be just as careful not to drain him of his courage by refusing to lend an additional team when his own wagon is hub deep in the mud.

Hence, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the recommendation of the House committee that this advance to the farm loan banks be limited to $25,000,000. I should be ashamed to return to my people if I did not raise my voice in objection. Let us make it fifty million, and if that should prove inadequate let us not scruple to add even more.

In this connection, gentlemen, I am reminded of Sam Jones's rabbit. The particular cottontail in question was being pursued by a flop-eared cur dog and was being mighty hard pressed, despite his doubling and feinting. Mr. Man, standing by, had his admiration stirred by the rabbit's gameness. He popped his hands and stamped the ground and shouted, "Go to it, old cottontail; go to it. There's a sink hole in the bottom by the big oak tree. I'm betting on you to get there first." "That's all right, Mr. Man," replied the rabbit, "but I don't need for you to pop your hands and holler at me. I'm doing my best already. What I need is for somebody to head that dog."

The farmer is doing his best already, gentlemen. He does not need us to praise him and blow about him here on the floor of the House or on the stump back home. What he needs is something practical. We Democrats and a few of you enlightened Republicans are trying to head the dog for him. Is the majority going to help us or hinder us? It is easy to talk, but what about action? Will you give us the fifty million or are you going to hold to the twenty-five million simply in order to protect your party organization and strengthen you in your fight against the Senate?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to raise the amount to be made available to the farmers of the country under this measure from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000, and for that reason I shall heartily support it. In fact, I should be very glad to see the amount increased $200,000,000; for if something is not done to give the farmers of this country an opportunity to secure adequate loans on their farms at a low rate of interest, I do not see how they are going to be able to stem the tide of adversity with which they are now battling.

Increasing this amount will not cost the Government a dollar; but, on the other hand, it will enable it to realize 5½ per cent interest on the amount loaned, whereas it is now deposited with the national banks of Wall Street and elsewhere at only 2 per cent. Therefore the Government would be getting 3½ per cent more interest on the amount loaned to the farmers than it is realizing on that money to-day. Besides, it would be secured by first mortgages on farm lands—the very best security under the shining sun.

This is one of the few measures that have come before this Congress for the benefit of the farming people of the Nation, and yet, strange to say, some men are vigorously opposing it. I can not understand their attitudes, unless it is because they are more interested in the fortunes of those financial profiteers who always prosper on the adversity of the farmers than they are in the welfare of the farmers themselves.

You are not giving the farmer anything by increasing the amount proposed in this bill; you are not even giving him a square deal, much less contributing to his financial welfare. You are merely taking the amount authorized herein out of the banks, where it is now deposited at 2 per cent, and loaning it to the farmers at 5½ per cent, thereby increasing the Government's income on the $50,000,000 provided for by this amendment by $1,750,000 a year.

But I will tell you where the opposition to this movement is coming from; it is coming from the big financial interests of this country, and they are using every pressure possible on the present administration to keep the Government from coming to the aid of the agricultural classes, so that they may be able to put their own money out at usury at the farmers' expense.

The big insurance companies, the loan corporations, the mortgage companies are now placing long-time loans throughout the country at 7 or 8 per cent interest, and even more, where they used to charge only 6 or 7 per cent, and some of them are charging the farmers an expense fee of from 3 to 4 per cent additional for making the loans at all. And they, Mr. Chairman, and all their influences, are lined up in opposition to advancing this credit to the farmers, upon whose shoulders rests the burden of producing the raw materials that feed and clothe the world. In my opinion it was the influence of these loan companies that stopped the Farm Loan Board from advancing these loans to the farmers in the beginning by attacking the constitutionality of the farm loan act; and when they failed to get the law declared null and void, after having it held up for a year in the Supreme Court, then they began to work other "mysterious ways their wonders to perform."

When the Federal Reserve Board began its deflation a year ago the farmers had just laid by the most expensive crop they had ever made in the history of the country. Everything they had purchased was at the very peak of high prices, and they were necessarily more heavily in debt than they would have been under ordinary conditions. If they could have sold their products before prices began to drop they could possibly have pulled through; but that privilege was denied them. The deflation began in the early summer, and by the time their crops were ready for market the price was so far below the cost of production that many a man was stripped of everything he had, including the home that it had taken him a lifetime of patient toil to acquire. In my opinion, that act on the part of the Federal Reserve Board will go down in history as the greatest financial injustice of all times.

It did not particularly hurt the profiteer who had coined his millions out of the blood and tears of the suffering men, women, and children of the world during the war. He had already prepared for the shock by placing his ill-gotten gains within the safety zone, by investing them in Government securities. He seems to have been amply warned of the approaching disaster, while the farmers were left oblivious of their impending fate until it came down upon them like a clap of thunder from a clear sky. If left more victims to its credit, or discredit, in bankrupts, suicides, failures, foreclosures, insane, poverty stricken, homeless, and hungry than any other one piece of tyranny that was ever perpetrated on American soil.

The Federal Reserve Board could relieve this panic in 10 days if the governor of that board and the Secretary of the Treasury were so disposed. If they were as much interested in the financial welfare of the American people generally as the Secretary of the Treasury is in defeating the bill providing for adjusted compensation for the ex-soldiers who went through the grime and dust and sweat and misery of the training camps or offered their lives in the bloody trenches of France, they could relieve this situation without delay.

We have more than one-third of the gold supply of the universe, and the Federal Reserve Board could easily issue $2,000,000,000 in currency or Federal reserve notes and still keep our gold supply above the requirements of the law; or they could issue these notes on the same class of collateral accepted by them for that purpose before they began their ruinous policy of deflation. But instead of that, the board has continued to retire, or call in, the money issued by it during and just after the war until it has deflated the circulation by something like a billion dollars, or possibly more, paralyzed the business of the country, and brought about the most disastrous panic through which the American farmers have ever passed.

And it is rather amazing to me to see the same men high up in official affairs of the Government who are responsible for the present financial condition of the country, or at least responsible for the continuation of that condition, when they have it in their power to relieve it—it is amazing to see those same men refusing this relief to the farmers of this country and at the same time advocating the spending of $500,000,000 a year on a Navy that is rapidly becoming obsolete as a result of modern progress, and when the prospects of trouble with a foreign foe are so extremely remote. During the first 16 years after the close of the Civil War we spent only $20,000,000 a year on the American Navy, but to-day we are spending approximately $500,000,000, or twenty-five times as much on the Navy each year as we spent on it then, although we are at peace with the world and the submarine and the airplane have supplanted and rendered obsolete the class of vessels which we are spending so much to construct and maintain. But that helps the big interests who are engaged in the manufacture of armor plate, steel, and munitions of war and gives a feeling of security to the oil magnate who invests his millions in foreign oil fields; it makes him feel that he has a country behind him with a sufficient Navy at its command to back him up if the people whom he is plundering in foreign lands should manifest any resentment at his high-handed methods of extortion.

Certainly it is better, from his viewpoint, to spend this Government's money in that way, by the hundreds of millions, than it would be to loan a few millions of it to the farmers of the country in small amounts in order to tide them over this panic and prevent their financial ruin. It is amazing to hear those men clamoring for an Army of 200,000 men when 50,000 would be amply sufficient for our present needs, and at the same time protesting against this pittance of relief for the farmers when it would not cost the Government a dollar.

The farmers of this country can not hold up much longer under these conditions. They are bound to have relief from some source if everything else remains as high as it is to-day and farm products continue to decline. The corn farmer of the West is selling his corn at 35 cents a bushel. How does that comport with the present high cost of living? How can he realize anything out of his crop after he pays the exorbitant railroad rates now in effect in order to get his corn to market? Do you expect him to continue to endure indefinitely this economic slavery without protest or complaint? Evidently some men do, judging from the way in which they continue their policy of discriminating against the agricultural classes.

The wheat growers of the country are selling wheat at a dollar a bushel, which before the deflation began was selling at $2.25, and if conditions do not change for the better they will be selling it for a great deal less before the end of the present year.

The cotton growers of the South still have on hand cotton that cost them more than 40 cents a pound to raise, and for which they could not realize 10 cents a pound to-day. Their crops are poor and their fields are swarming with boll weevil. The price of cattle and hides have gone almost to nothing. Practically every farm in the United States is under mortgage, and those mortgages will soon have to be either foreclosed or renewed. The loan sharks are already taking an inventory and preparing for the coming feast. They know the farmers have got to have the money and they know that, as a rule, the local banks are carrying all the loans they can stand. They know that unless this Government comes to the rescue of the farmers through the aid of the Farm Loan Board they will be forced to accept their loans at extortionate rates of interest, coupled with additional contributions, which added to that interest constitutes a usury that would shame the face of Shylock.

Therefore they and their agents in this capital are fighting day in and day out, in court and out of court, to prevent the Government from coming to the farmer's rescue and saving him from such a ruinous fate.

I sincerely trust that this amendment will be adopted increasing the amount to be made available as loans to the farmers to $50,000,000; and I hope that before this Congress adjourns some influence may be brought to bear that will quicken the conscience of this administration and arouse it to the necessity of legislation that will bring substantial and prompt relief to the farmers of the country before it is too late. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1837, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GAHN, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. PERLMAN, at the request of Mr. SIEGEL, for seven days, on account of the serious illness of his mother.

To Mr. KETCHAM, for to-day, on account of illness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. CRISP to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Mrs. M. E. Tison, Sixty-sixth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

To Mr. WALSH, in the pension cases of H. R. 990, H. R. 1000, H. R. 6785, H. R. 998, and H. R. 8020, Sixty-sixth Congress, no adverse reports having been made thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] inform me as to the prospects of the conference report upon the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] is here, and I would rather have him answer the question.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. We expect to present the report to-morrow and have it acted upon Tuesday if that is agreeable.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is there any particular reason why that report should not be acted upon on Saturday?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That I do not know. The gentleman will have to take that matter up with the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we can hardly take that report up immediately after it is reported, if it be reported to-morrow, and I understand the gentleman is not certain that he can report it by to-morrow.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think it could be ready to-morrow, although——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has not his report written out?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. We have not yet; we have just finished——

Mr. MONDELL. It is a little doubtful whether the report can be made to-morrow, and in any event, in view of the very great many items in the report, it would probably not be wise to take it up until the Members had an opportunity to investigate and read the report, and, further, at the end of the week there are a great many Members absent. My thought was that we would take up the report about Tuesday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I had hoped that if the conferees were able to report—and I understand they are able to report—that the matter could be taken up on Saturday. It is not a matter of personal convenience of mine at all.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, as the gentleman from Tennessee knows, there are many Members who do not expect to be here Saturday, and there are many Members who do not expect to be here Monday. We might call them back, or we might insist on their remaining, but the report could be taken up Tuesday and still give plenty of time to dispose of it and place it upon the statute books by the 1st of the month. I think it would meet the convenience of Members more if it were taken up on Tuesday than sooner.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Friday, June 24, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I present a resolution adopted by the Constitutional Convention of Louisiana memorializing Congress to pass an act which will forbid and penalize the transmission by telegraph, telephone, mail, or express or other medium of interstate transportation of form charts, entries, betting odds, tips, and other methods of suggestion. It is very brief, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF LOUISIANA, 1921.

Resolution 146.

Whereas subsequent to the prohibition of bookmaking on race tracks by Louisiana and other States, handbook betting has become a pernicious and demoralizing form of gambling, tempting young and old of both sexes, exercising a corrupting influence over American youth and manhood, often leading to great crimes and wrecking many homes; and

Whereas the State of Louisiana has enacted legislation denouncing handbook betting as gambling, punishable by fine and imprisonment; and

Whereas enforcement of such legislation is rendered difficult, if not impossible, owing to the fact that there is no inhibition against the interstate transmission by telegraph, telephone, express, and postal service, of information concerning horse racing, including entries, form charts, betting odds, tips, and similar sinister suggestions essential to the successful operation of handbooks; and

Whereas the suppression of this vice is, therefore, a national problem, not one with which the States individually may deal successfully—a problem on all fours with that of the Louisiana lottery, the destruction of which was only made possible by congressional action in 1891, denying it the use of the mails and express service for the transmission of its tickets and the results of its drawings; and

Whereas Louisiana and other States in which this evil has found lodgment and daily increases its ramifications are entitled to the support of the National Government in their effort to suppress it for the protection of the weal of their several communities: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Constitutional Convention of Louisiana, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to pass an act which will forbid and penalize the transmission by telegraph, telephone, mail, or express, or other medium of interstate transportation of form charts, entries, betting odds, tips, and other methods of suggestions; since it has been demonstrated that the only effective method of combating such an evil, as evidenced by Federal laws relative to lotteries, is action taken by the Federal Congress.

Adopted by the Constitutional Convention of the State of Louisiana on the 2d day of June, A. D. 1921.

HEWITT BEAUCHAUD,
President of the Convention.

Attest:

E. J. GALLIEU,
Assistant Secretary of the Convention.

Mr. RANSDELL presented 110 petitions signed by 3,290 citizens of the State of Louisiana, praying for the recognition of the Irish republic, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LADD presented a petition of the superintendent and teachers of the Congregational Sunday School, of Hankinson, N. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Washburn, Falkirk, and Wilton, N. Dak., praying that an international disarmament conference be called, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution of sundry members of Women's Nonpartisan League Club, No. 294, of North Dakota, favoring the calling of an international disarmament conference, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented three petitions of sundry citizens of Fredonia and Fargo, N. Dak., praying for the recognition of the Irish republic by the Government of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BROUSSARD presented a resolution, adopted by the board of directors of the Iberia Building Association at a meeting June 1, 1921, at New Iberia, La., favoring the enactment of legislation exempting domestic building and loan associations from income tax where the income derived by a member from savings in shares does not exceed $500, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIS. I present sundry petitions of 850 citizens of Columbus; 780 citizens of Youngstown, Conneaut, Lowell, and Struthers; 1,200 citizens of Cincinnati, Glendale, and Norwood; and 9,150 citizens of Cleveland, all in the State of Ohio, praying for the recognition of the independence of Ireland as an independent nation by the United States, which I move be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

AMBASSADOR GEORGE HARVEY.

Mr. OVERMAN. I present a resolution which has been adopted by Hornet's Nest Post, No. 9, of the American Legion, in relation to recent utterances of Ambassador George Harvey in England, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas George Harvey, the ambassador to Great Britain, has recently declared that America fought in the World War laggardly and selfishly: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Hornet's Nest Post, No. 9, American Legion, considers it evident that the ambassador was unable to share in the motives which led his countrymen into war, or to appreciate the splendid idealism of their leader, Woodrow Wilson, and, furthermore, that while he may represent the present administration at the Court of St. James, only by stretch of the imagination can he be considered to represent the people of this Republic.

RELIEF OF DISABLED EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the National Tuberculosis Association of America recently held a convention in New York City and adopted some resolutions relating to the treatment of ex-service men. Members of that association have made a very exhaustive study of the subject. Some of them are the most eminent physicians and experts on tuberculosis in America. I think the resolutions are of such public importance, and will be so useful in molding and shaping public opinion on this question that I ask that they be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the rehabilitation of our tuberculous ex-service men and women is at once our most imperative duty and the biggest problem in public health before our people; and

Whereas the National Tuberculosis Association, through the cooperation with the Government services, both of the executive staff and of its individual members, has acquired a close familiarity with the work of these various services and especially that of the tuberculosis hospitals; and

Whereas the best results in these hospitals can only be attained by the maintenance of a close cooperation of physicians and patients under strict disciplinary regulations; and

Whereas such conditions do not at present generally exist in Government tuberculosis hospitals in spite of the continuous and conscientious effort of Government departments; and

Whereas the chief causes of this fatal defect are: First, the demoralizing influence upon many of the men of the present compensation act and its administration; second, the failure of the public, of the Congress, of the local posts of the American Legion, and of other organizations interested in the welfare of ex-service men to familiarize themselves with the facts of the tuberculosis situation and to bring to the aid of the Government departments that intelligent cooperation which they sorely need and without which they can not do their best work: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it be urged upon Congress both by the executive office of the National Tuberculosis Association and by each affiliated State association through the members of its State delegation, that the Government departments be given the assistance necessary to establish the discipline so essential to the maintenance of this needed morale by:

First, such changes in the compensation act as will result in the immediate and material reduction in compensation for those cases who refuse to make proper use of the facilities provided for their benefit; and

Second, by making the welfare of the men and of the country at large, and not the desires of the individual constituents, the basis of action both as regards appointments of those charged with the care of these men and as regards the individual cases of the men themselves.

Resolved, That the National Tuberculosis Association hereby expresses its appreciation and commendation of the efforts thus far of the national officials of the American Legion to have corrected the defects in legislation pertaining to rehabilitation of ex-service men, and its administration, and urges the legion to continue those efforts and to see that its local posts throughout the country give their full cooperation to the Government departments in their efforts to prevent an uncontrolled minority of the ex-service men from seriously interfering as they now do with the chance of the recovery of their fellow patients.

Resolved, That the local tuberculosis associations throughout the country be urged to inaugurate immediately a campaign of publicity, which will give the people of their respective localities the true facts of the situation, and will develop in all parts of the country that educated public opinion the lack of which has been largely responsible for the present unfortunate situation.

Mr. GOODING, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1066) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close Piney Branch Road between Seventeenth and Taylor Streets and Sixteenth and Allison Streets NW., rendered useless or unnecessary by reason of the opening and extension of streets called for in the permanent highway plan of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 174) thereon.

JAMES L. VAI.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 84) for the relief of James L. Vai, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 99), as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 84) for the relief of James L. Vai, now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, and the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR VETERANS OF WORLD WAR.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 506) to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

SOIL SURVEY OF MILLER COUNTY, ARK.

Mr. CARAWAY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 96), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,500 copies of the Soil Survey of Miller County, Ark., for the use of the Senate document room.

SYSTEM OF DISCIPLINE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I submit a resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The resolution (S. Res. 97) was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

Whereas it is reported in the public press that a captain of the United States Navy has been removed from his command and transferred to an inferior station by order of the Secretary of the Navy as punishment for having conferred with a committee of enlisted men; and

Whereas such conference between officers and enlisted men are in accord with American democratic principles: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate be directed to investigate this case and report to the Senate regarding the entire system of discipline in the Navy, and ascertain from the officers and enlisted men of the Navy, as well as from the Secretary of the Navy, their views regarding the purposes and results of the system of committees of enlisted men.

MOUNT VERNON, VA., AS A NATIONAL INSTITUTE.

Mr. CAPPER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 98), which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Whereas, although privately controlled, the home and burial place of George Washington, "the Father of his Country," at Mount Vernon, Va., is the most precious and revered of national monuments and has been preserved and maintained by the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union, which is entitled to the highest public commendation for its patriotic purpose and labors, and is a sacred shrine and a source of patriotic inspiration and should be accessible to the largest number of our people, now barred by existing regulations; and

Whereas this historic spot is visited annually by many thousands of persons and has long been a place of national interest; and

Whereas it should be the spirit and aim of this Government to encourage its citizens to visit Mount Vernon; and

Whereas all over the country patriotic, labor, and educational organizations and private citizens, in a pure and patriotic spirit, have by resolution and otherwise urged free admission to the estate as well as the opening of the grounds on Sunday, and the feeling is general that there should be abolished forever the un-American system of tolls or admission charges exacted from the American public for the privilege of being admitted to the tomb of the Nation's first President: Therefore be it

Resolved, That to secure to the people of the world forever the magnificent tribute of our people to the memory of Gen. George Washington and with a view to perpetuating this national heritage to the American people and to allow them the privilege of admission free of charge, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to inquire into the probable annual cost to the Federal Government of maintaining the estate of Mount Vernon as a national institute, and submit to the Senate at the earliest practicable date a plan for the assumption of control of the estate by the National Government.

FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, on yesterday afternoon a rather interesting discussion was entered into by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] regarding the policies of the administration with respect to legislation. At that time, in a rather brief way, I made inquiry as to whether or not any steps were to be taken in the near future looking to the restoration of our foreign trade and to adjustment of our foreign affairs.

I then stated that, in my opinion, a great many people in the United States were waiting impatiently for some declaration of our foreign policy.

We have in New Mexico a newspaper which is very ably edited. It is an independent paper. In the last election it supported the Republican candidate for the Presidency and aided very materially in having the vote of New Mexico cast for Mr. Harding. This morning in looking over that paper I find an editorial bearing upon the question of our foreign policy, and I should like to have the Secretary read it. It is not long, but it presents the situation as a great many people at least feel about it, and it seems to me will convince those in authority that some definite policy should be entered upon in relation to our foreign affairs, so that permanent relief may be brought to this country. All of us feel that the situation is critical. We can not confine our activities within our own boundaries and expect prosperity in this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico for the reading of the editorial referred to by him? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

[From the Albuquerque Morning Journal, June 18, 1921.]

THE HOLT LETTER.

Mr. Hamilton Holt, editor of Independent, has written President Harding a letter anent his attitude toward a league or association of nations. The burden of the Holt letter is a demand that the President define the position of the administration on this very important question.

The President can hardly be heard to say that he has not had time to consider the matter. For interminable months the whole question was discussed in the Senate, during which time Mr. Harding was a Member. He voted for the league with the Lodge amendments. Under such circumstances any virile man would have definite convictions on so vital a question.

During the campaign Mr. Harding assumed a noncommittal attitude. Men like Hughes and Hoover, whom he afterwards honored with a place in his Cabinet, said that Mr. Harding was "for going in," with reservations.

JOHNSON and BORAH, irreconcilable opponents of any league, claimed Mr. Harding as their own and supported him. Col. Harvey, bitterender, is ambassador to Great Britain. Judge Hughes, proleaguer, is Secretary of State. Thus Mr. Harding equivocates.

As a Senator he may have needed no well-defined policy. As a candidate for the Presidency, his advisors doubtless thought he should announce none. But as President, charged with the responsibility for the welfare of the Nation, he must decide upon a policy and pursue it. To do less; to drift with the tide in the midst of the wreckage of our national prosperity, is not only unwise in policy but wrong in morals.

It is true that there is a great difference of opinion among Republicans on the subject. But Mr. Harding's function as titular head of the party, to hold it together, is secondary. His primary duty is to the whole people. Their welfare demands that he move constructively in some direction. This he should do openly.

The future of Mr. Harding and of his party is wrapped up in this question. It can not be side-stepped for a much longer time. The party is not now in the position of a destructive critic. It holds the reins of government and must adopt some procedure.

No policy will disgust the people more quickly at this crisis than any policy which might be decided upon will do. Mr. Harding must not fiddle while the world burns.

All the vast problems of restoring peace; all the enormous questions of reconstruction, all the essential steps to restore prosperity, apparently wait, while the President debates with himself how he may be able to ride two horses going in opposite directions.

If he wishes to follow JOHNSON, BORAH, and Harvey, let him say so. The people then can ratify or repudiate his stand. In our humble judgment they will repudiate it.

If he is for an association of nations, let him state concretely what kind of an arrangement he proposes. Then we can line up for the battle to create public sentiment and fight it out.

Peace and prosperity will come neither to America nor to Europe until this matter is settled. It will not take many months for the public to conclude that Mr. Harding lacks either the ability or the courage to take a definite position.

The great record of the party has been based upon its practical statesmanship in dealing promptly and intelligently with large national and international problems. Can it sustain that record under the leadership of Mr. Harding?

Mr. HARRELD obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma has been recognized.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me merely for an additional remark?

Mr. HARRELD. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I thought I had retained the floor, but if the Senator will indulge me, I merely wish to state that the editorial which has been read appeared in the Albuquerque Morning Journal of the 18th of the present month. I should further like to say that those people who have been boasting that 7,000,000 votes were cast against the League of Nations or any concert of nations for the preservation of the peace of the world, in my judgment, are sadly mistaken. The people of this Nation did not so register their will at the last election, in my opinion. They want something done to restore the peace of the world and world industry, and they believe that the United States should take an important part in that great movement.

ARKANSAS RIVER BRIDGE, MUSKOGEE COUNTY, OKLA.

Mr. HARRELD. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 6652) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River in Muskogee County, Okla.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge authorized by act of Congress approved May 27, 1920, to be built by the county of Muskogee, State of Oklahoma, across the Arkansas River at a point near Fort Gibson, in said county and State, between sections 16 and 21, township 15 north, range 19 east, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARKANSAS RIVER BRIDGE NEAR WEBBERS FALLS, OKLA.

Mr. HARRELD. I also ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6653) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at a point near Webbers Falls, in Muskogee County, Okla.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge, authorized by act of Congress approved May 27, 1920, to be built by the county of Muskogee, State of Oklahoma, across the Arkansas River, at a point near Webbers Falls, in section 18, township 12 north, range 21 east, in the said county and State, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAM ACROSS MAHONING RIVER, OHIO.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 4976) granting the consent of Congress to the Trumbull Steel Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio. The bill has been favorably reported by the Committee on Commerce and has the approval of the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask that the bill may be read in full.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Trumbull Steel Co. and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate at a point suitable to the interest of navigation a dam across the Mahoning River near the city of Warren, in the county of Trumbull, in the State of Ohio: Provided, That the work shall not be commenced until the plans therefor have been filed with and approved by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no dam constructed under the consent hereby granted shall be used to develop water power nor to generate electricity: And provided further, That the authority hereby granted shall cease and be null and void unless the actual construction of the dam herein authorized be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, before unanimous consent is given for the consideration of the bill, I should like to obtain some information about it. I wish to state to the Senator from Ohio my attitude in reference to the matter. As I understand this bill, it will authorize the building of a dam across a navigable river, with the approval of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War.

UMI

Mr. President, for many years bills of this kind were introduced in Congress and met negative action—and I am inclined to think that the negative action was a mistake in many cases—until finally we passed a general dam bill creating a commission composed of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture, to protect the public, providing that the public should have the right to recapture the water power at the end of 50 years, and making other provisions in the interest of the public.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. Now, everybody else that approaches this subject must go through that door; and I should like to know why the people interested here have not made their application, as they can, to the board appointed by the Government, to be dealt with as everybody else is dealt with.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that there is an amendment proposed to the bill which meets that very situation. It was the understanding, as the committee was informed, that these people would not desire to develop water power at all, and an amendment was put on the bill at the suggestion of the War Department providing that no water power shall be developed for the generation of electricity, and so forth.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What is the purpose of the bill? They are not building the dam for navigation, are they?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not for navigation. The Senator from Ohio can tell the purpose of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I think I can explain that to the Senator.

The Trumbull Steel Co. is a very large manufacturing enterprise in the city of Warren, Ohio. Its plant is so situated that it is upon both banks of this stream. The Mahoning River is a navigable stream perhaps in theory rather than in fact. If anybody ever saw a ship on that stream, they would think they were "seeing things."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that that is the case with most of them.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes. The plant, the works, the buildings of this concern are on both sides of the stream. This body and the body at the other end of the Capitol recently passed a bill authorizing the Trumbull Steel Co. to construct a bridge across this river. Now, it is proposed to authorize this company to construct a dam for the purpose, as I understand, of impounding water to be used solely in the manufacturing plant. It is a very large plant, one of the largest in the country, as I think the Senator knows; and, as the Senator from Washington points out, the amendment here proposed will meet the objections of the Senator from Alabama, because it distinctly provides that "this act shall not be construed to authorize the use of such dam to develop water power."

The reason why I am asking this unanimous consent, which I trust the Senator will grant, is because this is the season of low water, and if this work is to proceed it can be proceeded with now very much more advantageously than later; so in that sense there is an emergency connected with the legislation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not prepared to object, but I want to say something about this proposition before I give consent.

Mr. WILLIS. All right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not like to see a precedent made, and I regret that the committee is proposing to make a precedent now to ride over the top of the general dam bill, because, although I recognize the fact that this amendment will prevent these gentlemen from using this dam for power purposes at this time, you are going to give them an unlimited right to dam this stream and take away from other people the right to develop it for power purposes in the future. Now, I think what is fish for one should be fish for another. There is no man on this floor who has regretted more than I have the delays in Congress in the development of the great water powers of this country. There is no man who believes more thoroughly than I do that there has been great waste and great injury to the American people in the delay and the opposition to developing the great water powers of this country, and I have suffered from it. Outside of the great Rocky Mountain States, there is no State in the Union that has more undeveloped water power than the State I have the honor in part to represent, and yet our hands have been tied. We have had capital, we have had men who wanted to develop our resources, but our hands have been tied for 15 or 20 years in the development of the natural resources of Alabama and its water powers because Congress would not do for us just exactly what the Senator from Ohio is asking the Congress to do to-day for a great corporation in his State.

They said they would not do it because these water powers belonged to the people, and future generations had rights in them. Now, I know that if the amendment proposed by the committee is adopted it will prevent the use of this dam for the generation of electricity; but dams may be of use for water power without generating electricity. The purpose of a conservation bill, putting everybody on the same plane, to protect the water powers of this country for the future, was to protect them not only for use in making electricity but for all beneficial uses that the generations to come may have in the matter.

Of course, you have a commission down here now. It will not act. It has been slow in action. It has its business tied up. It is most difficult to get through its lines. I realize the difficulty that this corporation in Ohio may have if it has to go before that commission. The reason why I am not going to object to the Senator's bill is because I have suffered and my people have suffered by the blocks that have been put in their way when they have tried to develop their own resources; but I hope that this Congress is not going to break down the lines for a favored few and let the balance of us stand out and suffer.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to interrupt him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think there is considerable force in what the Senator says. My recollection is that we have passed a bill or two of this kind heretofore.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think any such bill has passed in 15 years.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so. I think one or two bills have passed with this amendment put on them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Hetch-Hetchy case in California is the last one that I know of.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I may be mistaken, but my recollection is that one or two bills have passed the Senate with this amendment in them since the water power act was passed. That was the sole reason why they were permitted to pass. They were proposed because of some peculiar local condition, and I am pretty certain that we have passed a bill or two of that kind.

I want to say to the Senator, and I want the Senator to consider that in connection with his attitude on this bill, that we reported yesterday another bill permitting the city of Huntington, Ind., to construct a dam for water-supply purposes, putting in this provision about the generation of electricity and water power.

As I say, I think there is a good deal of force in what the Senator has said, and I will state frankly that that phase of the matter was not considered by the committee. The committee did not intend to override the water power act, or to do anything that would interfere with the operation of that act. I can see how it is possible that by granting this right there we might interfere with the future development of water-power possibilities, and I think that is a matter that the Congress ought to consider, if the Senator's bill is passed. That is a situation that I think we ought to take into account.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sorry that the Senator's committee has taken this attitude in the matter, not on account of the Senator from Ohio and his purpose, because I have nothing to say against that; but right now the people in my State are trying to get a permit through this board that was created down here to furnish our people with light for our town, and the matter has been blocked for months. We can not get any action at all, and that is because we want to use the power to make some electricity. Those men want to use electricity in the interest of the public, while the men referred to in this bill want to use this water power for their own private dollars and cents.

If the Senate is going on with this procedure, I hope if the block continues that some day I can fall within the good graces of the committee myself and get some relief; but I do not think we ought to play flesh with one and fowl with another. We should all stand on the same basis, and the Senator's committee ought to protect the public rights in that respect.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator, and the people of my State are in the same condition that he is in. There have been no favorites played and the committee was not intending to play any favorites in this case.

I will ask the Senator from Ohio to allow this bill to go over for a little further consideration in reference to the point suggested by the Senator from Alabama. I will say that that phase of the matter was not considered by the committee. The committee did not intend to interfere with anything that is covered by the Water Power Commission act.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know that the commission has not acted as I had hoped it would act. It has acted as I feared it might. I felt all the time that it was a great mistake to create a commission composed of Cabinet officers to deal with this great work, because the time of Cabinet officers is so fully taken up with other things that they do not have the time to give to this matter the attention that it ought to have. I am satisfied that that is the real reason for the delay, simply because the members of the commission have their time so taken up with other things that it is impossible for them to give this matter the attention it ought to have.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that the amendment which his committee so carefully prepared and proposed here would cover the objection that he raises? Does not he think that will obviate the objection raised by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not. I will say frankly that I do not. The construction of this dam under this grant might interfere very materially with a very desirable development hereafter through the construction at that very point of a dam of a different kind. The water power act, too, makes it the duty of this Water Power Commission, before it shall grant a permit, to see to it that under the plans and specifications suggested all the water-power possibilities shall be taken into account and that the development shall be of the highest possible character. The only restriction on this authority is that this dam shall not be used to develop water power or generate electricity.

On behalf of the committee, I am going to ask the Senator to let the bill go over. I think we ought to give it further consideration. I will ask that both of these bills be referred back to the Commerce Committee. The other bill is S. 2069, Order of Business 172.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the two bills be referred back to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington object to the request for unanimous consent preferred by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I have to object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that this bill, together with the bill (S. 2069) to authorize the construction of a dam across Wabash River at Huntington, Ind., shall be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. NEW addressed the Chair.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before these matters are disposed of, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Ohio what the purpose of this bill is. I observe that it is provided that the improvement shall not be used for the development of water power or for the generation of electricity. To what use is it contemplated that the dam shall be put, if it can not be used for the development of water power?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Montana that my information about the matter is that this is a very large plant, one of the largest in the State of Ohio, and, as the Senator well knows, in a great plant there must be used in the regular course of the work a vast amount of water. I am informed that the purpose of the proposed legislation is to enable the company to construct this dam so that they may impound water for their use. There is no purpose at all, I am sure, to generate power for electricity; indeed, that is specifically prohibited by the amendment.

The Senator may not be acquainted with the conditions there. The Mahoning River is relatively a small stream. I am advised that at certain seasons of the year the water is very low—and, indeed, that is why I am pressing for action now—not affording a sufficient supply to enable the company to continue with their work, and they are desirous of making this improvement so that they can run continuously. That is the information which has been brought to me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, that contemplates, then, that the water is to be used in connection with the operation of this plant.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Necessarily to the end of fouling the water to a very considerable extent.

Mr. WILLIS. I did not catch the Senator's statement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The necessary consequence would be to foul the water to no inconsiderable extent.

Mr. WILLIS. To a certain extent I think that is true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So it presents the question as to whether we ought to grant the privilege to this company of deteriorating the water of the Mahoning River to the possible disadvantage of proprietors below.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator were as well acquainted with the Mahoning River as are my colleague and myself, I think he would not raise any question about that, because the Mahoning River flows through a great industrial section and, as a matter of fact, the river is already fouled about as much as it could be by a manufacturing plant.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Nevertheless we would authorize the further pollution of it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the details, but the bill, as I understand it, simply authorizes the impounding of the water. It is true there is a possibility of the fouling of the stream; but we have very drastic criminal statutes which prevent the fouling of that stream, so if they should attempt to do that they would be amenable to the criminal law.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] stated a few minutes ago is too true. For years and years various water power companies of this country were struggling for a chance to secure development. We passed several bills in the Senate when I was chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and before that, and after that we passed a number of bills, but every time we passed them here they would be held up in the House of Representatives, as the Senator from Alabama well knows.

We finally succeeded in passing what I consider a most cumbrous and complicated general water power bill. It provided for a commission consisting of three Cabinet officers. As the Senator from Washington well knows, and as everybody knows, they have no time to give it any attention at all. The law is so complicated that it has not been put in operation. Notwithstanding there are people who are ready to develop water power in this country no effort has been made to secure permission under that law; and I doubt whether the law in its entirety will work satisfactorily and lead to that development of the water power which we ought to have in this country. Hence, Mr. President, whenever bills of this kind come before Congress I heartily favor them, because it gives a little relief, which people can not get under the general law.

Take the case in Indiana, covered by this other bill. They want the privilege of building a dam for the purpose of securing a water supply for domestic uses in that town, and for nothing else. It is sad to think that they have to come to Congress to get permission to secure a water supply from a stream running right through their own town, and a stream which, as a matter of fact, is not navigable. Yet they have to come here. They either have to come here and try to get it in this simple, plain way or they will have to take the steps provided in that cumbrous water power act, which is of such a complicated nature that there is little use for them to make an application for relief through an improvement of this kind.

I think in that water power act we overdid it, and, Mr. President, speaking for myself, I am anxious to see the water powers of this country developed, but I fear that that law will act as a brake.

Hence, when cases like this come before us from Ohio and Indiana, I can not do otherwise than support such a measure, and I heartily approve of this one. It is a little homeopathic relief from the great allopathic relief that was supposed to be given in the great water power act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is one peculiarity in the amendment which strikes me as being improper. Although the amendment has not been read, everyone seems to understand what it is. Here is a dam permitted, and then an amendment is put on the bill which provides that when the dam is built the water power must not be used. It is like authorizing the putting of a pump into a well and providing that you shall never pump any water with it after you get it in.

I am not familiar with the conditions along the Mahoning River, and I am not opposing this bill. It may be that this is one of the navigable streams which is dry four or five months in the year, and that you would have to get artesian wells, as they do in Texas, and run water into it in order to make it navigable. If that be true, and by damming the water they can hold it back and use it for some purpose, I have not any objection. But it does seem just a little peculiar to say that when you dam a stream and get it ready to develop some electricity you shall not do it.

If there can be anything developed there in the way of water power for electrical purposes, or other purposes, I would like to have somebody get the benefit of it. I do not believe that the appointment of a commission, as provided for in the general water power bill, was a practical solution of the difficulties. I said so when the bill was before the Senate, and tried to get it amended, because Cabinet officers are not competent to pass on the questions likely to be raised as men would be if they were permanently in positions of this kind, who would become expert, and who could devote all their time to it. We can not expect the Cabinet officers to look into all these things.

But, Mr. President, it is not right, no matter where the water power is, to prevent its development, provided only that the development is regulated so that the people who really own the power should get the benefit of it. We are having our Chamber here cooled to-day by a lot of electrical appliances operated by coal, making it habitable to man. Somewhere in the vicinity of the Capitol some fellow is shoveling coal into a furnace to make these fans whirl and keep us cool, and in sight of the smokestack where he is shoveling in his coal there is water power going to waste that would not only turn these fans but every other wheel in the District of Columbia. Talk about delay, Mr. President! We have it right here. Just a few days ago we decided that that water power should not be developed, and that the man should keep on shoveling coal in order to turn these things and a few other things.

The delay is not only taking place in Alabama but it is taking place right here in the shadow of the dome of the Capitol. We are not developing it. We are not saving our coal. We are not economizing.

If this particular stream in Ohio is not capable of development so as to produce electric power or operate machinery from water power directly, then this amendment is not necessary. It seems to me that we are inconsistent when we put on an amendment which would prohibit the highest development. If there is water power there which can be developed we should not by an amendment to a law interfere with it, no matter who is going to get the benefit of it. Somebody will. If there can be any water-power development there we ought to permit them to develop it, if we permit them to build the dam.

Therefore I can not understand why the committee are proposing to add such an amendment. I would like to hear the reason from the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the original text of both of the bills as introduced contains the following proviso:

Provided, That no dam constructed under this authorization shall be used to develop water power or generate electricity.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the object of that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The object was to show that it was not a dam the construction of which should come under the Water Power Commission. That was the real purpose of it. I can see where dams can be constructed for purposes entirely apart from water power for the generation of electricity.

Mr. NORRIS. So can I.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator has raised the point which I understood the Senator from Alabama to make, that by granting a permit to construct this dam for purposes other than the development of water power we may prevent the construction of a dam for a much broader object—for the develment of water power; and it is for that very reason that I want the bill to go back to the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. If power can be developed there so as to make water power that can be used by the people of the community——

Mr. JONES of Washington. That ought to be done.

Mr. NORRIS. It ought to be done.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. We should not take any step which would prevent it. I can conceive of a stream where you could not develop water power, and this may be one. If this is one of them, then that language is unnecessary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true; but the idea, of course, was not to make this act a means of evading the water power act.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator that the power to evade that act should not be given.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That was the real purpose of it. But the idea the Senator has just given expression to is the reason why I have asked that the bill go back to the committee so that that can be considered.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, this matter is already settled, because the Senator has objected; but to keep the RECORD straight, I want to call attention to this fact: Mahoning Valley is a great industrial valley. As I have already said, the Trumbull Steel Co. is one of the largest concerns in the valley. Every Senator knows that industry is at rather a low ebb just now. We have temporarily decided not to pass the bill but to refer it back to the committee. The effect of that is to delay an improvement which would furnish immediate employment for hundreds of men and make possible the enlargement of this plant, which would furnish employment to thousands. That is the effect of delay in the passage of the bill. I am not complaining about it, but I am calling the attention of the Senate to the fact.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that stream of such a nature that water power could be developed on it?

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, the Senator knows water power could be developed on any stream.

Mr. NORRIS. Not on any stream.

Mr. WILLIS. On any stream of a considerable volume. The Mahoning River, as I have suggested, is one of those streams which is navigable only in theory.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood that; but it occurred to me, from what the Senator said a while ago, that possibly the stream is dry during a part of the season.

Mr. WILLIS. No; it is not dry, but the water gets very low; for example, just at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. If water power can be developed there, then we ought not to take any action which would prevent the people of the town from getting the benefit of it by giving it away to somebody.

Mr. WILLIS—

> Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
> Thy gory locks at me.

The bill I have advocated did not have this amendment in it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to hear the Senator make that statement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Ohio, I think, is mistaken in that. The bill he advocates did have this proviso in it:

Provided, That no dam constructed under the consent hereby granted shall be used to develop water power or to generate electricity.

That is the way it passed the House, with that provision in it, and the committee put in an amendment merely changing the language, because it was suggested by the War Department as better language than that used in the text of the bill.

Now, Mr. President, I want to refer just in a word to a suggestion made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. I agree with very much the Senator said. Of course, the water power was hardly satisfactory to anyone. It was a compromise proposition, and everyone, or at least those who were urging it, realized that it had a great many cumbersome provisions in it. But it is the law, and everybody ought to come under it as long as it continues to be the law.

As the Senator from Alabama said, we ought not to make fish of one and fowl of another. We ought not to pass special legislation to benefit one particular locality that can be taken care of by the Water Power Commission and the water power act as long as it stands upon the statute books.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Just a moment. This is the particular statement to which I wish to refer that was made by the Senator from Minnesota. As I understood him, he said there had been no application made under the water power act for permits to put in dams. The Senator is mistaken in that. There have been many applications filed. I have written a letter to the Secretary of War asking for a statement of the number of applications filed and the number granted. There have been many applications filed, but action has not been taken upon them, because the commission has not been able to get around to establishing and adopting rules and regulations pursuant to the act under which the permits should be granted.

I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to ask the Senator this question: Would the language of the amendment, confining it to uses other than the development of electricity or power, prohibit that same company, supposing they got a permit from Congress and constructed a dam for the purposes indicated by the Senator from Ohio, from going before the Water Power Commission and getting the privilege or authority to develop the power after they had built the dam? It seems to be the opinion here that if they construct the dam for purposes other than the development of power and electricity, the act would indefinitely prohibit that power from being used for that purpose. Why could not this same company later on, if they got permission to build the dam, go before the Water Power Commission and get a permit to develop that power?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not any doubt that any dam constructed under the provisions of the act would not be such a dam as would develop water power for the generation of electricity; but I do not see anything in the pending bill, if it should be passed, that would prevent the company in the future from going to the Water Power Commission and making an application to construct the dam or place the dam in such condition as would develop water power and generate electricity.

Then, of course, they would have to comply with whatever conditions the commission might impose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if things do not change from what they have been in the past, the steel company, if it did make an application for a permit, would find itself in this position: The present officials of the department will be dead and buried and new officials, more than likely appointed from those who are now mere babies, if not yet unborn, will be in charge of the company if it should survive that long. There are hundreds of applications for water-power permits filed since the act was passed, but there seems to be more necessity for seeing that the surveys are placed upon paper 45 inches wide and 61½ inches long, or of some other exact dimensions, and that the paper is of a particular tint and form that will fit some particular file that has been specially made for the commission than there is for considering a mere application for a permit. The mere question of granting a permit is of small importance in comparison with the size of the files of the commission and the particular words in the application. An examination of the proposed site is made not once but many times before the engineer will even consider an application for a permit.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Senator from Utah happen to know how many permits have been granted since the law was passed?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say, but I think I could count them on the fingers of one hand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the request for unanimous consent proposed by the Senator from Washington. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is that the two bills to which reference has been made, Senate bill 2069 and House bill 4976, shall be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the bills are recommitted.

DESTITUTE DISCHARGED SOLDIERS IN EUROPE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1019) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish free transportation and subsistence from Europe to the United States for certain destitute discharged soldiers and their wives and children.

The amendments of the House were, on page 1, line 9, after "person," to insert: "and transportation and subsistence en route to such person and his wife and children from point of debarkation in the United States to the point of enlistment of such person or his home of record or to any other point to which he may desire to be furnished transportation for himself, wife, and children: Provided, That such point is of no greater distance from the point of debarkation than is his point of enlistment or home"; on page 1, line 9, after "Provided," to insert "further"; on page 1, line 10, to strike out "or" and insert "and"; on page 1, line 11, after "transports," to insert "in Europe"; on page 1, line 13, to strike out "or" and insert "and"; on page 1, line 14, to strike out "all"; on page 2, line 1, after "furnished," to insert "to such person, his wife, and children"; on page 2, lines 1 and 2, to strike out "such person, his wife or children" and insert "them"; on page 2, line 2, to strike out "Provided further, That the author-" and all of lines 3 and 4; on page 2, after line 4, to insert:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby further authorized to furnish transportation and subsistence en route, as contemplated above in the case of destitute former soldiers in Europe, to any person who was honorably discharged from the Army of the United States in Siberia and who is now in Vladivostok or its immediate vicinity and is or becomes destitute, and to the wife and children of such person: Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized, in transporting such persons to the United States, to procure transportation and subsistence for them on vessels other than United States Army transports from Siberia to Japan."

On page 2, after line 4, to insert:

"SEC. 3. That the authority conferred by this act shall cease and determine six months after the approval thereof."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish free transportation and subsistence from Europe and Siberia to the United States for certain destitute discharged soldiers and their wives and children."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this is a Senate bill returned by the House with some amendments. The question would naturally arise whether the Senate should ask for a conference or should concur in the amendments without a conference. I had expected, when the Secretary had finished reading the amendments, to say a few brief words and then move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. May I inquire what the bill is?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senate some time ago passed a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to provide transportation across the ocean and also transportation in France to the port of embarkation for certain destitute American soldiers.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The House has amended the bill and provided that they shall have transportation also from the point at which they land in the United States to their homes. One amendment, as I also recollect, extends the same authority to the Secretary of War for certain destitute American soldiers who were left in Siberia.

Mr. REED. How did our soldiers happen to be left destitute in those countries?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They applied for and received their discharges in France before their units were ordered home, intending to go into business in France, thinking they had profitable occupation and good prospects there. Several of them married and have families. It has developed since that some of those men have been unable to get along; they are destitute, their money is gone, and they are going to the American consuls and the American Embassy asking for help to get back home. They will be brought in Army transports.

Mr. REED. Bringing them home in that way will not be much more expensive than to have returned them if they had been returned in the regular way, coming back with the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true; except that the families, if they have families, will now be brought with them. It is charity. It is a charity, however, in which I think the Government should indulge. It will be a credit to the Government of the United States to relieve these men who are now waiting in these far-off countries.

I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am in favor of this bill and the House amendments thereto. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has acted wisely, as he usually acts, in pursuing this course.

We are this morning advised by the RECORD and by the newspapers that a bill has been introduced by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance providing for the refunding of the debt owed to the United States by various European Governments. A pathetic appeal is made to us that if we do not refund this debt or cancel it, Uncle Sam will be sued for nonsupport by Europe. But, facetiousness aside, let us consider the situation.

During the war $9,710,525,310, practically all of it in cash, was loaned to various European Governments. I suppose practically every Senator here approved of extending such credits during the war.

This money derived from the sales of Liberty bonds is now overdue and the interest thereon is unpaid, hence over $10,000,000,000 are due to-day from Europe to the United States.

Mr. REED. From Europe and Liberia.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; quite true.

It is time when we must think of America more and of Europe less. Over a year ago I said, "Let Europe go to work." I repeat that to-day, "Let Europe go to work." The European people are not now pressed harder nor are they enduring more privations or hardships than were endured by our ancestors here 100 years ago. Quite true some distress and misery exist in Europe and some are very wretched, but if in their large cities they gave up their frivolities and attacked the duties and problems of life seriously they would not be appealing in such pathetic terms to have the time of payment of this indebtedness of $10,000,000,000 extended indefinitely.

I recently received a telegram, which I am not going to read, from a gentleman in my State whose opinions I have always thought were worth while. He protests against this adjusted compensation for ex-service men, this "bonus" for soldiers, as he calls it. It is not a bonus. It is adjusted compensation. Many of the slackers who stayed at home demanded $10 a day for their services, but the soldier received only about $30 a month, and the bill is simply to adjust, in some measure, the soldiers' compensation. I am not an adept in figures like my friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and others, but a mere tyro in figures can immediately ascertain that on the $10,000,000,000 heretofore loaned to Europe, were interest at 4 per cent per annum promptly paid to the United States, we would realize annually the sum of $400,000,000, which would in 10 years aggregate $4,000,000,000, an amount far larger than the proposed bonus.

I protest against any action extending the time for the payment of the debt due to the United States from Europe. I especially demand that the interest thereon be paid promptly.

I have not been an indiscriminate critic of this administration nor have I tried to throw a monkey wrench in the machinery. The times are too serious for such things.

I want this administration, as I want all other administrations, to have a fair chance to approach the problems of the day and solve them; as a Senator who desires to assist this administration in all its proper efforts to liquidate the World War, I sound a warning now that it is wrong in principle, wrong in economics, wrong to Europe, and basely wrong to the United States to extend the time indefinitely for the payment of the European loan. To notify Europe that she must begin to pay at least the interest annually is the best way we can serve the world and serve America. We should notify Europe that if she will cease spending so much money on armies and navies she will experience but little difficulty in meeting the interest due the United States on the amounts we have loaned. The Republican Party and the Democratic Party should stand firmly against any policy or plan which would give to any official the authority to delay and defer indefinitely the payment of the interest on these great loans.

Mr. President, if a beggar comes to your door and you give him a $5 bill to-day, he will politely thank you. To-morrow he will not be so polite; he will be there to demand another $5; and on the third day he will be there with a club to collect. Europe is a part of our common human nature; as long as the European chancelries and lords of the European exchequers can borrow money from America they will continue to do so. We saved Europe and our Christian civilization, but that does not imply, now the peril is passed, that we should feed the Europeans and allow them in their great cities to live in idleness and sometimes in luxury whilst our own people are pressed to the point of pain here at home. Our producers are entitled to consideration.

I feel that I speak but the sentiments of many Senators and the sentiments of the American people when I say that it is time for Europe to begin to liquidate her obligations; it is time for Europeans to abandon any further thought of subsistence and food free from the United States. It is time we should begin to pay our soldiers who saved civilization; it is time to hospitalize them, as we have done in a measurable degree; it is time to extend to the ex-service man the fivefold option plan such as Senate bill 500 proposes, so that if the ex-service man wishes to take a cash payment as adjusted compensation he may do so, or may avail himself of any one of the options therein.

Addison tells us the story of the upholsterer who was industrious, paid close attention to his affairs, and who by devotion to his own business was able to keep a coach and servants. His table furnished forth good fare, his house was attractive and comfortable, all from the earnings of his business, which was prospering by reason of his close attention thereto. He was educating his family in accordance with the best traditions; suddenly he became enamored of the idea that he could neglect his upholstery business and that he ought to instruct Holland and Prussia as to what they should do. He neglected his shop and spent his time telling what his Government should do for the various Governments of Europe, and customers who came into the shop were inconvenienced and disgusted over his inveterate discussion as to how his Government should help Europe. His customers fell away; poor workmanship came out of his shop; finally he found himself a bankrupt; the family coach was sold, the family plate was sold; his daughter, who was attending a college, was required to come home, and his son was apprenticed out to another man as an indentured servant, all because he insisted upon upholstering Spain, France, Holland, Prussia, and Russia and utterly neglected his own affairs.

We will be entitled to and will win the esteem of our countrymen if we will cease upholstering foreign countries and devote our attention to the affairs of the people who pay our salaries and who have elected us to these great offices. Let us begin now to take care of the American people, for we have done our full duty to the peoples of Europe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is there any objection to that?

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say just a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish merely to take not over one minute to reply to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will not the Senator from Utah first permit the motion to be put? Then, later, the Senator from Utah may address the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. It was on the pending motion that the Senator from Arizona addressed the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona has just made the statement that the most salutary thing that could happen to the world would be for the United States to demand of Europe that the interest due be paid upon its foreign obligations. I am not now going to take the time of the Senate to discuss the matter at length, but I merely wish to tell the Senator from Arizona that he is mistaken. I wish to say to the Senator very briefly that it would be the very worst thing in the world for the United States to make such a demand.

It is too long a story now to tell the Senator, but I wish to say to him that, so far as I am personally concerned, if it were possible to do so and not interfere with the foreign trade of the United States, I would agree with every word the Senator has said as to what should be our action, but it is not possible; and if it were undertaken the result would be disastrous not only to Europe but to the United States as well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I notice that on yesterday the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] introduced a bill giving very large powers to the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to funding the obligations of foreign Governments which are owing to the United States of America. Will the Senator from Utah be kind enough to state just what is the purpose of that measure?

Mr. SMOOT. The purpose of the bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to extend the time for the payment of the obligations, as well as the interest, due by foreign nations to the United States. Under existing law the Secretary of the Treasury has not that power.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is that the real purpose of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. There are other purposes which are stated in the bill, but I do not know whether or not the Finance Committee will report the bill without amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah, is it or is it not the real purpose of the bill to provide that the United States may receive the obligations of Germany and Austria which have been taken by the Allies as reparations in lieu of the obligations of the allied nations to us?

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is not the real purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is not the purpose, why, if I may ask, is this provision inserted in the bill——

Mr. SMOOT. I promised that I would take only one minute of the time of the Senate, as the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is desirous of having the amendments of the House to the Senate bill concurred in.

Mr. McKELLAR. With that understanding, we may let the matter go over, but I am very anxious to know the meaning of the following provision of the bill:

> And from time to time to receive bonds and obligations of any foreign Government in substitution for those now or hereafter held by the United States of America—

That is a very remarkable provision in the bill, and I hope later on the Senator can give us a little light on it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say now, in answer to the Senator, that that provision in the bill would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make the exchanges mentioned by the Senator if the Secretary saw fit to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to discuss this question a little later, but the Senator from New York has a bill which he desires to have acted upon, and I will not discuss the matter further now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may we now have the question put?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of the unfinished business.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. I agreed to yield first to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. KING. Very well.

PAN AMERICAN POSTAL CONGRESS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 80, making an appropriation of $5,000 to pay the expenses of two delegates to the Pan American Postal Congress to be held in Buenos Aires on August 10 next. This is the conference that is authorized under the Universal Postal Union, and is to be held in furtherance of plans that have already been adopted, notably at the last meeting, held at Madrid in November, 1920. At that time an agreement was entered into between the nations there represented for a flat postal rate from each of the various countries to the others belonging to the union, so that when that agreement is finally concluded it will be possible to mail a letter here at our local rate of 2 cents and have it carried at that rate to any nation belonging to the Postal Union to which it may be addressed.

The convention to be held at Buenos Aires beginning August 10 is of the utmost importance to the business interests of this country and of other countries included within the union as affecting communications passing between such countries. The joint resolution has been reported and passed once by the Senate.

Mr. KING. Who is to make the appointments?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Postmaster General is to appoint two delegates to the congress. The joint resolution comes with the recommendation of the department, which I have at hand. The letter from the department is long, but I shall be very glad to have it inserted in the RECORD if any Senator desires.

The provisions embodied in the joint resolution were adopted in an appropriation bill last year, but they were not agreed to by the House. The joint resolution has this morning been reported by the Committee on Appropriations to this body. If the joint resolution is to be passed, it should be passed at once in order that the Postmaster General may act so that the Government may be represented at the congress which meets on August 10.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will there be representatives at the congress from all the nations which are members of the Postal Union?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There will be.

Mr. SMOOT. All of the countries of the world which are members of the Postal Union will be represented.

Mr. KING. I think we ought to pass the joint resolution.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I shall not object to that, if it does not interfere with the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) authorizing the Postmaster General to appoint delegates to the Pan American Postal Congress, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment, in line 11, to strike out the word "conducive" and to insert the word "conclusive," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint two delegates to the Pan American Postal Congress, Buenos Aires, Argentina, beginning August 10, 1921, and for the purpose of paying the expenses of such delegates the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended in the discretion of the Postmaster General and to be accounted for on his certificate, which certificate shall be conclusive on the accounting officers of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will say that the amendment reported by the committee is merely to correct a clerical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I send to the desk a letter from the president of the Iowa Gas & Electric Co., of Washington, Iowa, which I ask to have read.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will yield after the reading of the letter shall have been concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

IOWA CITY, IOWA, June 22, 1921.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FRELINGHUYSEN: Everybody I ever talked to about the damnable coal situation has said, "Why don't the Government do something? Why are we held up in this way? Wilson is doing nothing; but wait until we get a change of administration, and you will see some constructive work done that will prevent a repetition of what we have passed through."

Now, when a proper control is attempted the coal associations and their flunkies flock to Washington to block the passage of laws that will prevent profiteering and place their business where it should be classed with other public necessities.

Coal is next in importance to water. It would be a nice state of affairs to extort money or let people die of thirst. That is about the deal the people have had on coal. It is, as you know, controlled by few interests, who are daily taking on new mines and extending their absolute control.

It is the life blood of industry, and the increase in its price by camouflage and underground sales dummies has been a great factor in the cost of living.

The railroads have been gouged, the factories have been gouged, the public utilities have been gouged, the laboring man has been likewise gouged by coal prices, and yet with these conditions the coal crowd have the nerve to come in now and say it is not necessary and would be paternalism that will spread. This is pure bunk to get outside interests to their aid. If they are as rotten as coal operation, they should get the same laws to apply.

The banks of this country have prospered under Government control, because they make them lay their cards on the table and must be on the square with their patrons. The railroads got it in the neck because they stood pat on the "public-be-damned" policy.

The public utilities are under State control, because it was for the best interest of consumers, and the arrogant managers were put out and good service demanded.

No honest person denies coal operators the right to make a fair income on their business. The United States Government is the only one to fix rules and regulations governing coal, which is one of the vital interests for the success and prosperity of the Nation's industries and comfort of its people.

This spring the Illinois coal operators fixed a price of $2.85 for screenings, as compared to 90 cents prewar and $2.20 price fixed by Government during war. It was this or nothing. Most of the larger buyers told them to go to h——l with that price.

To-day that same screenings is offered in any quantities at $1.50 per ton mines. The few they frightened into their $2.85 price are stuck. I mention this to show that they are thoroughly organized and will put over anything if they can.

Yours, very truly,

GEORGE S. CARSON, President.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I desire, if possible, to get a vote on this measure to-day. If there is any Senator who wishes to speak on it, of course I will let the measure lie over until Monday. I think that all of the Members wish to get away this afternoon early, and have a recess over Saturday and Sunday. I think the real debate will come on Senate bill 1807. All has been said on this bill that I think Senators wish to say, unless the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] desires to offer some amendments; but I should like, if possible, to get an agreement for a vote and dispose of this bill. It is easily understandable. There is no need of debating it to any extent. Then we can dispose of the other bill at the Senate's pleasure.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I have no objection to a vote on this bill. I want to occupy about 10 minutes of the Senate's time at this time or immediately after the vote is taken, if we are to have a vote taken right way. If the Senator can get a vote now, I will wait until afterwards.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course, I shall not ask for a vote without suggesting the absence of a quorum. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that suggestion?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will withhold the suggestion.

CONDITIONS IN COAL FIELDS OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. KING. Day before yesterday I gave notice that I should move to reconsider the action of the Senate by which Senate resolution 80 was passed. Pursuant to that notice, I now ask unanimous consent that we may temporarily lay aside the unfinished business, so that I may move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which Senate resolution No. 80, known as the Mingo resolution, was passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that before that is done I shall be compelled to suggest the absence of a quorum, on account of knowledge I have that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] desire to be present.

Mr. KING. I notified the Senator from California that I should make that motion to-day because to-day is the last opportunity.

Mr. JOHNSON entered the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from California has just entered the Chamber.

Mr. KING. I have no interest in the matter. I gave the notice because I knew that there were some Senators absent from the Chamber when the resolution was passed who desired to be heard. In order to save that opportunity for them, I gave notice of the motion, and I now desire to make that motion.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does not the Senator think the absence of a quorum should be suggested?

Mr. KING. There will be no vote. I just want to enter the motion. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. I was under the impression that the rule required that that motion should be entered to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion has already been entered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not want to interfere with the object of the Senator from Utah in moving a reconsideration of the matter. He was deeply interested in it, and he was out of the Chamber at the time. I realize that it was one of those oversights that occur.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator right there that I was not particularly interested, but a number of Senators were, and because of their absence from the Chamber I submitted the motion.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I consider this coal legislation of great importance, particularly the seasonal coal bill, at this time. If the Interstate Commerce Commission are going to do anything to stimulate the buying of coal by a reduction of freight rates, they ought to do it now; and I feel that the discussion of this bill ought to go on and that it ought not to be displaced. I have yielded to Senators now for four days in connection with bills relating to other matters, and I feel that the Senator should wait until this measure is disposed of, because he has already entered his motion for a reconsideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no desire to press it; but the Senator from California has been very courteous in the matter, and I promised him that I would make the motion to-day so that the Senator from California might take such course as he desired.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, permit me to say to the Senator from Utah that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] suggested that he wanted to be heard for about 10 minutes upon this question. I feel that I would be justified in moving to lay this particular motion upon the table and have a roll call; but if the Senator from Montana insists that he wishes to speak I have not the disposition under any circumstances to preclude him from doing so. It is essential, however, if the resolution is to be of any consequence at all, that it be speedily passed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I object to the laying aside of the unfinished business.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the present status of the suggested motion of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand that it is the impression that the matter to which reference has been made will take only about 10 minutes. I am anxious to give every consideration to these Senators, and I withdraw my objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, to bring this matter to a head, unless the Senator from Montana should personally insist upon the matter, I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. I hope the Senator from Montana will not ask that that motion be withdrawn.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the matter seems to have gotten into a very jumbled condition. No motion has been made yet. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] on day before yesterday gave notice that he would make a motion to reconsider a certain vote.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. He has just made the motion.

Mr. MYERS. He has?. I did not hear him make it. I have been listening. When did he make it?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Five minutes ago.

Mr. MYERS. I did not hear the Senator from Utah make any motion, but he tells me that he has just made it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I may assist, if the Senator from Montana will permit me. Does the Senator think his remarks will take but 10 minutes?

Mr. MYERS. I was going to make a little statement about the matter. I did not hear the Senator from Utah make any motion, but he says he did.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, what I am doing I am doing in the interest of the Senator from Montana. I stated a few moments ago that I desired to move to reconsider the action of the Senate, and the Chair advised me that it was not necessary; that the motion had already been made; so to that extent I proceeded to make the motion. Now it is before the Senate. I have nothing to say, and if the Senator from Montana desires to speak, I hope he may have the time that he desires.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMOOT. Was unanimous consent granted to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, all this is out of order until that unanimous consent is given, unless the Senator makes a motion to displace the unfinished business.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I was just going to make that suggestion myself; but the Senator from Utah has done it quite as well as I could, or better. The unfinished business is before the Senate, and without unanimous consent for displacing it, the Senate can not consider anything else, and no Senator can speak on anything else unless he wants to speak on something not before the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion to the Chair, since the parliamentary question has arisen, that it will not be in order for the Senator from Utah to make a motion to reconsider what the Senate did yesterday, and that it would follow that nobody could make a motion to lay that motion on the table because the unfinished business was pending.

The Senator from Utah is entitled, as I understand, to make his motion, if he wants to, within two days. That is a privileged motion. The rules give him the right to make it; but, having made it, if the Chair should then say that because there is unfinished business before the Senate the motion can not be considered, the effect of it would be to hold up indefinitely the action of the Senate that was taken the other day. Certainly when the Senator makes his motion it would be in order, notwithstanding the unfinished business or anything else, for the Senator from California to make a motion to lay it on the table; otherwise, one Senator could forever hold up the action of the Senate that took place two days before.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, to avoid any controversy in the matter, I was proceeding to ask unanimous consent, after I had submitted the motion, that we temporarily lay aside the unfinished business, in order that the motion which I had submitted might be considered, because I was advised that the Senator from Montana would speak but a short time, and that would conclude the matter, and I supposed that we could take a vote on this resolution within 15 or 20 minutes at the outside, at the expiration of which time we could again proceed to the consideration of the coal bill. That was the program which I had in mind, and I thought the Senator from New Jersey understood it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That was my understanding—that the motion of the Senator from Utah was that we temporarily lay aside the unfinished business, that this other matter would not take over 15 or 20 minutes, but that if it did he would agree voluntarily to see that the unfinished business was restored and that we proceed to vote, if possible.

Mr. KING. I certainly should do all that I could to that end.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. With that understanding, I withdrew my objection. Now, I understand that the Senator from California desires to move that that motion be laid on the table.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion and permit the Senator from Montana to conclude his remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask if the Senator from Montana is not willing that a vote should be taken in that fashion, on a motion to lay on the table?

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean by that to cut off the Senator from Montana from any discussion?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I do not want to cut off the Senator from Montana at all.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Montana does not want more than 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON. But in view of the situation, and since this resolution to be efficacious must become determinative in a very brief period, I ask the Senator if he is not willing that the vote shall be taken upon a motion to lay on the table?

Mr. MYERS. I had wanted to say a few words on the motion, but of course the Senator from California has the power to make that motion. I could have said three times over all that I was going to say while we have been talking about the parliamentary situation, if I had been allowed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Now the Senator from Utah moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate adopted Senate resolution 80.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I will not make at this time the motion I contemplated, in order that the Senator from Montana may have an opportunity to address the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, as long as the Senate has wasted about 20 minutes in a useless and fruitless discussion of a parliamentary tangle, I will perhaps waste a few minutes more. I had intended to speak perhaps 15 or 20 minutes on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], but inasmuch as the Senate seems to desire to get to other business, and as this matter comes up so late, and at an inopportune time, and the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is anxious to dispose of it quickly, I shall try to confine my remarks to 5 or 10 minutes, and dispense, probably to the pleasure and the delectation of the Senate, with much of what I was going to say.

I think resolutions such as that introduced and so ably championed by the Senator from California are an invasion of the executive branch of the Federal Government. This matter, I think, belongs with the executive branch of the Government. If the governor of West Virginia, with the powers which he has, can not control affairs within that State, enforce the law, and uphold peace and the rights of citizens, it is his duty to call on the President of the United States to aid him. I do not think it concerns Congress at all; I do not think it is any of Congress's business, and I think such investigations as this are a useless consumption of time and money and result in harm instead of good. I think the action of Congress on such resolutions inevitably tends to prolong strikes longer than they would otherwise last. They consume time and money to no good purpose, generally.

I understand that the investigation of the Commission on Federal Industrial Relations and the printing of its report cost about $800,000, and I do not suppose one one-hundredth part of 1 per cent of the people of the United States ever read the report or paid any attention to it.

The only effect of this investigation, if we have an investigation, will be to give publicity to the strike, and I do not suppose one one-hundredth of 1 per cent of the people of the United States will ever read the statement of the facts that are brought out, or give any attention to the publicity given by an investigation.

This matter was put up to the President of the United States by the governor of West Virginia, and I think the President of the United States did his duty when he declined to interfere and told the State authorities of West Virginia that they must handle their own problems so long as they could, and that until they could show that they were incapable of upholding peace and order and lawful government in West Virginia, he would decline to interfere; and I think he was right. If Congress now launches an investigation of the conditions surrounding that strike, I think it will be a plain invasion of the prerogatives of the executive branch of the Government, and one invasion begets another. If we invade the executive prerogatives in this matter, it is likely that some time in future Congress will be called upon to investigate race riots in California between Americans and Japanese, and some time Congress will be called upon to investigate race riots in the South between the whites and Negroes, when it is the duty of the governors of the States to uphold law and order and stable government in their respective States, and if they can not do it it is their duty to call on the President of the United States to aid. It is not of Congress's business whatever, and we will be setting a bad precedent if we sanction and grant such an investigation as is called for by the resolution of the Senator from California and thereby invade the functions of the executive branch of the Government. If we should do it, it would undoubtedly result in one invasion after another and in frequent invasions by the legislative branch of the executive branch.

There has been a great deal of talk in Congress about the attempts of the Executive to invade the legislative functions of the Government. There may have been some attempts in that direction, but I think Congress invades the executive functions more than the Executive invades the legislative functions. I think the fault lies with Congress. I think the decided tendency is for Congress to invade the executive functions, and Congress interferes with those functions time and time again to no good purpose. I say let Congress attend to its own proper affairs and keep its hands off of executive functions.

I know it is a thankless undertaking to oppose a resolution of this kind. All the sympathy and all the sentiment and all the popularity is in favor of an investigation of this kind, and a Member of Congress who opposes it is looked upon as being hard-hearted and unsympathetic with human suffering, and he is, I have no doubt, branded in some quarters as being an enemy of organized labor; so that the popular thing is to favor all investigations asked for. But it does seem to me that there should be something, somewhere, sometime, that Congress ought to keep its hands off of, for the benefit of constitutional, orderly government and the welfare of the people. It does seem to me that there ought to be found something somewhere that the Federal Government, through its legislative branch, ought to keep its hands off of, and it does seem to me that there ought to be somewhere, sometime, some rights and functions and prerogatives of a sovereign State which the Federal Government ought to keep its hands off of until absolutely compelled to interfere, through the Executive, in order to give a republican form of government to one of the States of the Union. But I am beginning to despair of finding anything of that kind at all. The States appear to have no rights safe from the ruthless hands of Congress.

As I have said, it is a thankless task to oppose a resolution of this kind, and probably a futile task, because the disposition of Congress is to give, give, give, give to everybody who wants anything. Give everybody everything they want is now the motto in Congress. Give away everything! The popular thing in Congress nowadays is to vote for everything anybody wants. Never oppose anything! It is unpopular to do so. I rarely have known Congress to refuse anything to anybody. The only time for a long time I have known the Senate to refuse anything to anybody was day before yesterday, when it refused to grant an appropriation of $200,000 for the development by the Federal Government of water power at the Great Falls, in the Potomac River, and that was only refused in an indirect manner, in a conference report. The Senate may once in a while refuse to give somebody something that is wanted through the indirect method of action on a conference report; but the Senate does not often directly refuse to give anybody anything, and if that proposition to develop water power at Great Falls comes up yet in a separate bill, and a record roll call is had, I dare say there will not be over 15 Members of this body who will vote against it on a direct issue.

The constant tendency of Congress is to give something to people, to give people everything they ask for. I believe if half a dozen women or half a dozen men would come around the Capitol and interview Senators and demand something in the name of an alleged large number of organized voters, they could get anything they wanted, from the creation of a new department of the Government, with a Cabinet officer to preside over it, to an investigation of a dishwashers' strike at the Willard Hotel in this city. I believe that if there was a dishwashers' strike at a hotel in this city and some representatives of the strikers would come around and, in the name of organized labor, demand an investigation of it, they would get an investigation by the Senate. There seems to be no such thing any more as Congress refusing anybody anything. Members of Congress seem to go on the theory that it is easier to give than to oppose. Where is to be the end of this orgy of giving? It appears that a small, compact, organized, militant minority these days can get anything it wants of Congress.

The constant tendency is to give everybody everything they want, and the result of that is that we have a Government not of the majority but a Government of the minority, by the minority, for the minority. The people who want these things usually constitute a small, organized, militant minority. They represent a minority and they get what the minority wants, when, as a matter of fact, if the issue were plainly understood by the entire American people I think ninety-nine times out of a hundred a majority of the people would be against granting these concessions. Almost invariably Congress gives what a minority demands, not what a majority of the people want. We are ruled by the minority. This is now a Government of minority rule.

A small minority, representing perhaps 1 per cent of the people, or one-tenth of 1 per cent of the people, comes here and demands things in the name of some organization, such as organized labor, consumers' leagues, housewives' leagues, a national organization of women voters, a so-called reform league of some kind, when they represent only a minority of the people, but nearly every time they get what they ask for. Congress seems to be afraid to refuse anybody anything. The consequence is, it is a minority ruling the people of this country. The majority are constantly being ruled by the minority. I suppose this requested investigation will be granted, the same as practically everything else that is asked of Congress is granted.

As I have said, I do not suppose it is of any use to oppose a resolution of this kind. I suppose it is a waste of time. But I have felt that somebody should raise his voice against the constant tendency of Congress to give something to somebody every time a small minority asks something, and thereby institute the rule of a minority instead of the rule of the majority.

This investigation may be had; it probably will be had. I have never known of an investigation of anything that was asked by anybody that was refused by the United States Senate, and I suppose this instance will not be an exception. But the investigation asked for by the pending resolution will not be granted by my vote, and, therefore, I shall support the motion to reconsider. If my vote could decide it, the resolution would be ordered reconsidered and then defeated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana and I are old fogies. We have not yet found out that the States have neither sovereignty nor jurisdiction, and that the States are not respected in this body. They are not supposed to be able to do anything, not even to keep the peace within their borders. We rush to their assistance every time there is a little riot. The Senator said something about race riots in the South. If we were to investigate recent race riots, we would find that they have all been in the North; there have not been any down in the South for quite a long while.

But, leaving that out as a side issue, Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has made a great mistake. He is not on the qui vive, the front line of modern progress—progress verbally. He is not in the front rank of the uplifters and the "progressives," where he ought to be. This resolution is not objectionable because it goes too far, as he seems to think; it is objectionable because it does not go far enough. We have already had one committee to investigate the conditions in the coal region of West Virginia, and it edited an enormously large report and sent a bill for an enormously large sum of money to the Senate to be paid out of the contingent fund. I remember that one item of the charge was that a lot of mountaineers summoned to give testimony had spit all over the carpets and had ruined the sofas in one of the hotels in West Virginia, and the United States Government was called on to pay for that damage as one of the incidental expenses of the investigation. So we became responsible for carpet and rug destroying influence of the tobacco chewing of the mountaineers of West Virginia, and I believe we finally paid the bill, although about that I am not certain. I remember I was a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate at that time and rather opposed the payment of that sort of consequential and remote damage committed by the United States Government upon the hotel proprietors.

The Senator has made a mistake. He ought to have objected to this because it did not go far enough. What we really need is an investigation committee to investigate investigation committees. We need especially a committee to investigate the former investigation committees of various sorts to determine what they have done and why they did it, what they said or why they did not say it, and how it came about that they did or they did not do or say something. So that we ought to have a general supreme court or appellate investigation committee of all other investigation committees to determine whether they were originally properly constituted, whether they ever did anything that anybody recognized, or whether they ever said anything that anybody ever read.

Then, after we are through with that, Mr. President, we ought to have a commission on commissions. I want, above all things, a supreme or appellate commission on commissions. I offered a bill about two years ago for a commission to investigate other commissions, to determine their raison d'être, and the probable date of the end of their activities. Now, you start a lot of commissions, and a commission goes on forever. It may be possible that there is an argument against the immortality of the soul, but there is no possibility of argument against the immortality of a commission.

I had an old friend once who was placed upon a commission to determine certain things with regard to the District of Columbia. He was the father of a distinguished Senator now in this body, but he was a Member of the House at that time. I went to him once and said, "Judge, when is that commission going to finish its work?" He said, "John, I don't know exactly; but my doctor tells me that I am not in very good condition physically, and I hope to make its work last as long as I last," and he did. It lasted until after he was buried, and then the remnants of the commission brought it to a conclusion under a murderous assault of the House of Representatives.

What I want is not done—that this committee shall be appointed—but I wish to add to its powers the power to investigate the other investigating committee that examined into the coal strike in West Virginia and to give us a solemn opinion as to how that former investigating committee did its work and performed its duties, and whether or not it would not be advisable to resurrect or resuscitate the former committee as a cooperating body with this committee. Then I want, above all things, a commission on commissions to determine the raison d'être, the cause of the existence of all commissions, and to make a report to Congress upon the probable time of the cessation of the activities or inactivities of each of these commissions.

I am in favor of government by commission. I think that is a government by experts that gets rid of Senators and Members of Congress and the common, ordinary herd of common people. What I want is government by commission, but I want also a supreme court of investigating committees and commissions to investigate the other investigating committees and the other commissions, and at least to determine when the cases before them have been concluded. I would suggest that the functions of this committee be extended so that it shall examine into the previous committees and other committees of like character, and that it shall act as a sort of supreme court of appeal and determine whether or not the decision reached by the last committee on investigation of this particular question—by the way, I am making an awful mistake. I was about to say determine whether the decision reached by that committee should be affirmed or reversed, but the fact is it did not reach any decision at all. It acted about like this one is going to act. It will hear everyone who wants to be heard—"witnesses," they call them; that is, everybody who volunteers to come forward.

What would anyone think of the ultimate justice of a decision in a court of justice where no witnesses were heard except those who volunteered to come forward? No one would come except those who had an interest at stake. The public would not have much to do with it. That is about on a par with the hearings before the standing committees and the special committees of the Senate. A fellow comes rushing forward, "I am Jones; I live in Buckatonkee; I know all about this and I want to be heard," and heard he is at once. Then another man comes on the other side, and he says, "I am Smith, and I live in the adjoining precinct of Sokalowanee, and I want to be heard in this here matter;" whereupon he is heard. The man who has a real interest in the country and not a special one in the controversy is not heard at all. He is not pushing himself forward and he is not summoned by the committees.

The committees are not seeking impartial witnesses. There is always an animus behind each one of these investigating committees which is to carry through a certain purpose, and as a consequence the investigating committee hears everyone who, as the committee thinks, will swear in favor of the committee's purpose. Then those people come forward and swear accordingly. If you will tell me what a man's tariff politics are and from what part of the Union he comes and what he is manufacturing or importing, when he is summoned before the Committee on Finance on the tariff question I will bet goose eggs against blackbird eggs by weight that I can pretty nearly outline his testimony before he delivers it to the committee.

I hope the Senator from Montana will cease his useless, foolish, old-fogyish, retroactive opposition to all these uplift movements, which consist in forming a committee for the purpose of bringing into the limelight somebody's private purpose. When the private purpose is duly brought into the limelight, then the committee pronounces no judgment. It makes no decision. It just says, "Here is the evidence which we have taken; read it, all of you." Then all of us say, "I will be dogged if I will. I have but 70 years to live, and I am not going to read it," and we do not read it. I am ashamed of the Senator from Montana! [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to reconsider the vote by which Senate resolution No. 80 was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was rejected.

PROHIBITION OF SHIPMENT OF SMALL FIREARMS.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, some months ago I introduced a bill for the purpose of aiding in the suppression of the sale and carrying of pocket pistols and revolvers concealed about the person by prohibiting the transportation of them through the United States mails or by interstate common carriers. The number of the bill is Senate bill 1184, and it is now pending before a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary for the purpose of having hearings.

I have received several letters in regard to that bill, caused by propaganda that is being vigorously carried on against it by the manufacturers of such firearms. This morning I have a letter from Mr. Benedict Crowell, president of the Army Ordnance Association. I desire to read that letter:

ARMY ORDNANCE ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1921.

Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The attention of the Army Ordnance Association has recently been directed to Senate bill No. 1184, introduced by yourself, prohibiting the interstate transportation of pistols, revolvers, and other small firearms.

We are informed that the passage of this bill would restrict the manufacture of pistols and revolvers to the quantities bought by the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. Inasmuch as the termination of the war left the military services with great reserves of these weapons, it will be many years before the War and Navy Departments again become heavy purchasers of these small arms. These industries to-day are therefore dependent for their existence on the sale of pistols and revolvers to private individuals, and to terminate that sale by law means the termination of the entire industry.

Thus, the passage of this bill would destroy the industry upon which this Government must rely in case of war not only for its pistols and revolvers but largely for its machine guns and similar weapons, and in the event of another emergency there would be no established industry to which the Government could turn for these indispensable arms.

The passage of this bill, therefore, would be a severe blow to the continued military preparedness of the United States, and the Army Ordnance Association feels bound to invite your attention to these matters and to protest against the favorable consideration of this bill by your committee.

Yours, very sincerely,

BENEDICT CROWELL, President.

Of course, his great apprehension that many years hereafter some of the manufacturers may not exist, and that in the meantime they ought to be allowed to prey upon the public by manufacturing instruments of assassination and murder is not very tenable.

I have replied to Mr. Crowell in this matter, because this is a letter similar to many I have received from other sources, similar to one I received from the general counsel of a great railway company, who said he opposes the bill because the railroad company might transport a pistol either on the person of a passenger or in a box without knowing it, and therefore be guilty of a violation of the terms of the bill. Certainly that gentleman never practiced criminal law or he would know that no man was ever convicted of a crime for an act of that kind unless he committed the act knowingly and willfully. Similar arguments are being made against the bill.

The misrepresentations with reference to the bill are so gross that I have written Mr. Crowell upon the subject, and I wish to read a copy of my reply to him, as follows:

JUNE 24, 1921.

HON. BENEDICT CROWELL,
410 Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CROWELL: Your letter, opposing Senate bill 1184, prohibiting interstate and postal transportation of pistols, revolvers, and other small firearms to States where the sale and carriage of the same is forbidden by statute, received this morning.

You have evidently misunderstood the terms and purposes of this bill. It does not prohibit the shipment of such pistols as are ordinarily used in the United States Army and Navy, but especially excludes them from its prohibition.

The several States of the Union all have laws prohibiting the carrying of firearms of the class the transportation of which is intended to be prohibited, and, with few exceptions, all have laws prohibiting the sale of such firearms. These laws have proved abortive because the manufacturers of small pistols advertise their wares in the papers circulating in the States and ship them by mail or express to anyone desiring them in the State, and thus through the mails and through the interstate-commerce carriers they have interfered with local government and the State's police power in their efforts to suppress crime.

The small arms are not used in warfare, nor are they necessary to enable the citizens to keep arms in his home for defense. The large pistols are the ones used for these purposes, and are best suited for these purposes. The small pistols which are carried concealed about the person are used for the purpose of executing private vengeance, robbery, assassination, and murder, and not for any lawful purpose. It is these the law is intended to reach and suppress the sale of.

Thus you see that there is no interference with the manufacture of the arms used in the Army and Navy, and the factories can still exist and continue to manufacture such guns both for the Army and for sale to the citizen to protect his person and his home.

It is not necessary for either public or private purposes that these manufacturers be allowed to continue the manufacture and sale of the weapons of assassination, robbery, and murder. It is only for their sordid private profit that they desire to continue this business regardless of the manner in which they violate the State laws and the fearful and deplorable results of their action to the peace and safety of the public. I know you are not in favor of allowing these weapons of assassination to be furnished to bad people any more than you would some subtle poison that could be carried and concealed and administered generally. I suppose that you are aware that the statistics show that about 80 per cent of the homicides and personal assaults are committed with these small arms.

The manufacturers of the arms are appealing to all sorts of interests in opposition to this bill, and are carrying on a very extensive propaganda to defeat it, making gross misrepresentations of its scope and effect.

I propose at the proper time in the Senate to disclose the same in detail.

Very truly, yours, etc., JNO. K. SHIELDS.

Mr. President, there will be a hearing next Tuesday in the rooms of the Committee on the Judiciary upon this bill, at which the manufacturers who are so much interested can appear, as well as those whom the manufacturers by their propaganda have interested. It is hoped that all of them will appear, especially the latter class, and that they will bring with them the letters that they have received from the manufacturers urging them to make objections and to attempt to defeat the bill, for the committee want to know the motives for their action and will call for that information. The entire matter may then be sifted out and heard. We want especially an opportunity to correct misrepresentations to the effect that the possession of all pistols is prohibited by this proposed legislation and that it will prevent men from buying the large pistols in order to defend their persons and to keep in their homes for self-defense. Under this bill the purchase and possession of such pistols are not in any way interfered with.

REFUNDING OF FOREIGN LOANS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was very much surprised to read this morning the bill introduced on yesterday by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the substantial effect of which would be to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to accept German, Austrian, and Turkish bonds in lieu of the allied indebtedness which is due to us. In order that the Senate may understand just exactly what I mean, I will read the bill in full. It is very short and reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized from time to time to refund or convert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America (including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation), arising out of the European war, into bonds or other obligations of such or of any other, foreign Government, and from time to time to receive bonds and obligations of any foreign Government in substitution for those now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America, and to adjust and settle any and all claims not now represented by bonds or obligations which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

Mr. President, in my judgment, a more unwise, a more impolitic, a more unfair, or a more unjust, a more un-American measure to the United States could not have been devised. Beginning in April, 1917, the United States loaned large sums of money to our allies in the World War. We made a contract with them; we passed a law in which the terms upon which those loans were made were very aptly and fairly set out. I want to read one of those terms which is found in section 2 of the act of April 24, 1917, and I ask unanimous consent that then the other terms be inserted in the RECORD without reading, following immediately after I have read the one in question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for publication in the RECORD of certain matter which he has described. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now read section 2 of the act to which I have referred, which shows the contract which we made with our allies:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase, at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, their obligations hereafter issued bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act; to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign Governments and for the subsequent payment thereof before maturity; but such arrangements shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent per annum under the provisions of section 5 of this act, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign Governments held by the United States shall be, by such foreign Governments, converted in like manner and extent into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act.

The matter ordered to be printed in the RECORD on request of Mr. McKELLAR is as follows:

[From Public, No. 43, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved Sept. 24, 1917.]

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to establish credits with the United States for any foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States; and, to the extent of the credits so established from time to time, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to purchase, at par, from such foreign Governments, respectively, their several obligations hereafter issued, bearing such rate or rates of interest, maturing at such date or dates, not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued under the authority of this act, or of such act approved April 24, 1917, and containing such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine, or to make advances to or for the account of any such foreign Governments and to receive such obligations at par for the amount of any such advances; but the rate or rates of interest borne by such obligations shall not be less than the highest rate borne by any bonds of the United States which, at the time of the acquisition thereof, shall have been issued under authority of said act approved April 24, 1917, or of this act, and any such obligations shall contain such provisions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine for the conversion of a proportionate part of such obligations into obligations bearing a higher rate of interest if bonds of the United States issued under authority of this act shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest, but the rate of interest in such foreign obligations issued upon such conversion shall not be less than the highest rate of interest borne by such bonds of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to enter into such arrangements from time to time with any such foreign Governments as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for the payment of such obligations of foreign Governments before maturity. For the purposes of this section there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000,000,000, and in addition thereto the unexpended balance of the appropriations made by section 2 of said act approved April 24, 1917, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to establish credits for foreign Governments, as aforesaid, shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

[From Public No. 328, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved Mar. 3, 1919.]

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized from time to time to convert any short-time obligations of foreign Governments which may be received under the authority of this section into long-time obligations of such foreign Governments, respectively, maturing not later than October 15, 1938, and in such form and terms as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such long-time obligations at the time of their acquisition shall not be less than the rate borne by the short-time obligations so converted into such long-time obligations; and, under such terms and conditions as he may from time to time prescribe, to receive payment, on or before maturity, of any obligations of such foreign Governments acquired on behalf of the United States under authority of this section, and, with the approval of the President, to sell any of such obligations (but not at less than par with accrued interest unless otherwise hereafter provided by law), and to apply the proceeds thereof, and any payments so received from foreign Governments on account of the principal of such obligations, to the redemption or purchase, at not more than par and accrued interest, of any bonds of the United States issued under the authority of the first Liberty bond act or second Liberty bond act as amended and supplemented, and if such bonds can not be so redeemed or purchased, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem or purchase any other outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States which may at such time be subject to redemption or which can be purchased at not more than par and accrued interest.

SEC. 8. That the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by the Secretary of the Treasury by virtue of the provisions of the first Liberty bond act and the second Liberty bond act, and amendments and supplements thereto, shall mature at such dates as shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That such obligations acquired by virtue of the provisions of the first Liberty bond act, or through the conversion of short-time obligations acquired under such act, shall mature not later than June 15, 1947, and all other such obligations of foreign Governments shall mature not later than October 15, 1938.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the remarkably favorable conditions upon which this money was loaned to our allies. It was loaned and as security their bonds were accepted at par. I do not happen just at this moment to recall the price at which the best bonds of the foreign Governments were selling at that time, but probably it was not for more than 50 or 60 cents on the dollar. I shall later look up the matter and put into the RECORD the exact price for which they were selling when the loans were made. However, we loaned the money on the bonds at par when our allies would have had to suffer a tremendous discount if they had obtained the money elsewhere; and, indeed, when these loans were begun our allies were selling their bonds at a fearful discount and at enormous rates of interest. We made the first loan at 3½ per cent. Afterwards the rate of interest went up as high as 5 per cent, at which per cent we ourselves had to borrow the money with which to make the loans.

What more favorable terms can be imagined than those on which we loaned this money to the Allies? The terms were most advantageous to the borrowers, more favorable than they could have possibly gotten anywhere else in the world at that time. We loaned them this money freely and without stint; we had a contract with them of which they were aware when they borrowed the money, because the loans were provided for, and they borrowed the money under a statute of the United States, a law of the land. So that there can not be any misunderstanding about it. There ought not to be any misunderstanding on the part of our own officials in regard to it, but it seems there is.

While I am on this point I wish to say that I am not complaining of this proposed law and action for political reasons. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that last fall I undertook on the floor of the Senate to force the then Secretary of the Treasury to give us information about America's foreign loans and what it was proposed to do with our foreign indebtedness. At that time it was currently reported that there was on foot some such plan as is proposed in the bill introduced yesterday by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, and fearing that some such scheme might be adopted, I undertook then, by resolution and by speech, to get from the then Secretary of the Treasury, who belonged to the same party that I do, information concerning these loans. However, we did not get it, and now after months of waiting, what do we find? We find a plan proposed for the United States to swap its indebtedness, 99 per cent of which probably is good, and to take German, Austrian, or Turkish bonds for it. That is what this bill means. Remember the conditions: We loaned the money freely, in unlimited amounts, at a rate of interest less than one-half of what they were paying to others for money at the time, and took their bonds at par when they were not worth probably over half of that, and many of them not worth half. Yet it is proposed by the administration under this bill deliberately to throw away, as I believe, this great indebtedness, amounting now, principal and interest, to about $11,000,000,000. It is proposed deliberately to give the Secretary of the Treasury the right to swap this indebtedness, which is good, with the exception, perhaps, of that owned by Russia—and I have no doubt Russia will pay us eventually, because Russia is a great rich country—for German bonds, for Austrian bonds, and Turkish bonds. I call attention to the fact that, without any examination and without any report to Congress by the administration as to what is proposed to be done——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in just a moment. Without any report as to why it should be done, the administration is asking for the power "to receive bonds and obligations of any foreign government in substitution for those now or hereafter held by the United States of America." I now yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's able speech more than to furnish the figures as to the Russian loan, which amounts to something less than $380,000,000; $367,000,000, I think, to be exact.

Mr. McKELLAR. The principal indebtedness of Russia is $367,000,000, which, compared to the total indebtedness of from $10,000,000,000 to $11,000,000,000, is exceedingly small; if we lost it all it would not be of very great consequence; but there is no reason why, if our Government officials do their duty, they should not receive every dollar of Russian indebtedness, as well as every dollar of the indebtedness owed by the other countries.

What is the meaning of this bill? I asked the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] what it meant, and he first told me that it meant that we wanted to change the interest rates and the maturities of the bonds. In all conscience, how could any official of the Government seek to lessen the rates under which we loaned this money to the Allies? We loaned it on exactly the same terms as we got it from our own people. Is it possible that any American citizen would even attempt to say that we ought to lend this money at a lower rate of interest than we borrowed it from our own people? And, of course, in good conscience we could not raise the interest rate on our allies. Then, why give the Secretary the power to change the contracted interest rates?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I was occupied when the Senator made his first statement, but from the statement he has just made, do I understand him to say that I intimated that the Secretary of the Treasury was going to fund these loans at a lower rate of interest?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. I am glad the Senator interrupted me, because I would not want him to be under a misapprehension about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps I did not understand the Senator's statement, my attention having been called in another direction.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will explain to the Senator exactly my understanding of what he said. I asked him why this very remarkable bill was introduced, and he said, as I recall his explanation, first, that it had to do with the interest rate and the maturity of the bonds, both of which propositions do appear in the bill, and then I read to the Senator the provision which allowed the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange this indebtedness for the bonds of other nations, and he said that was also one of its purposes. Now, those are the three purposes of the measure as agreed to by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the purpose, as I told the Senator, was, in the first place, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to extend the time on the loans, and also to extend the time on the interest that may be due. Under existing law the Secretary of the Treasury has no authority to do it, and that is one reason for the introduction of this bill. The Senator is perfectly correct in the statement that this bill does give the Secretary of the Treasury the right and the power to take bonds from one country for bonds of another, and frankly I want to say to the Senator that I think that is a great power to confer upon the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to know that the Senator has a feeling of that kind, that it is too much power to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, let us take it up; let us analyze this bill for a minute.

The first proposition is that it gives the Secretary the power to fix interest rates. I say that it is impossible for any representative of this Government who believes in his Government and who is looking after its interests to fix a lower rate of interest than is provided by law now. That rate of interest for a very large portion of the bonds is 3½ per cent, and then it goes up only to the extent that we ourselves have had to pay interest. We lent money on bonds that could not be sold at par; we lent money to the amount of the par value of bonds that could not be sold for 50 cents on the dollar in many cases; and to say that under those circumstances we ought to take a less rate of interest than we pay ourselves is something that I am sure neither the present Secretary of the Treasury nor any other Secretary of the Treasury would for a moment think of or dare to do. Of course, it would not be fair to our allies to increase the rate over what we contracted to let them have the money for. If that is true, why do you need any additional power about interest rates? The law itself now fixes the interest rates, and that provision of the bill ought to go out.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is the best provision in the whole bill. The existing law gives the Secretary of the Treasury the authority, and not only gives the authority but directs him, to charge whatever rate of interest our own bonds carried at the time the loan was advanced to a foreign country.

That is why some of the original loans were made at 3½ per cent, because the first bonds that we issued carried interest at the rate of 3½ per cent; but the law also provided that as the rate of interest changed in the sale of Liberty bonds, so should it change in the notes that were received from foreign countries.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no—the bonds that were received.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the United States has not received a single bond from foreign countries.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know it; and that is just what I am coming to. If the Senator will permit me to go on for just a few moments I think I can convince him that the officials of both administrations have been signally negligent in carrying out the plain provisions of the law in reference to these bonds. The law plainly directed them to take bonds, and they have not done it.

The Senator says there is no provision by which the Secretary of the Treasury can defer the payment of interest. A large number of these obligations have been given for four years, all of them for three years or more, and not a single cent in actual interest has ever been paid except that one or two little countries have paid a small amount; but upon probably $10,000,000,000 of the indebtedness not a single cent of interest has been paid.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken there. England has paid a considerable amount of her interest.

Mr. McKELLAR. She has paid in the way of certain balances.

Mr. SMOOT. If she had not paid in that way we would have had to pay her that amount.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, she has settled certain bills due by letting them go on interest; but I say that no Government that borrowed money from us during the war has made any provision for the payment of interest on its indebtedness to us. Some small amounts of interest have been paid, as the Senator says, by the arrangement of accounts; but no Government has even prepared to pay the interest, and only one Government has even talked about it.

If the Senator will permit me to go on for just a few moments, I will yield to him a little later.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not care about the Senator yielding at all. I thought he asked me a question, and I was going to answer it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call attention, in the next place, to the next provision of the bill, which is to extend the maturities of these obligations. Now, why is this power to extend maturities given? Under the acts authorizing them these bonds are to run until 1947. I can not see that there is very much trouble about the length of time for which these bonds would run. They were to be 30-year bonds. Because our allies did not execute and deliver them when they agreed to is no reason why we should make them longer termed than 30 years. Our officers have made no effort to get the actual bonds. They have not carried out the law. We have had nearly three months and a half of a Republican administration. I thought that when they came in with all their promises to look after the financial affairs of the Government they certainly would carry out the law and convert these great debts into bonds, as the law requires. Of course, if it was impossible for our allies to pay the interest I thought the Secretary of the Treasury might come in and ask that the back interest be funded into bonds. Something like that would have been proper and right; but to come in here asking for a blanket authority to substitute for these good debts the at present practically worthless bonds of Germany, Austria, and Turkey is, to my mind, something that is absolutely foreign to what we ought to do in this case, and it is a bill that the Congress ought not to entertain for a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor the President of the United States has any idea of taking worthless bonds from one country as against good bonds from another.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, if such is not their intention, why put this provision in this bill? Why give them that authority? The Senator knows that the bonds of Germany are practically worthless.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator knows that the bonds of Austria are absolutely worthless. He knows that the bonds of Turkey are worthless. Now, if you are not going to take those German, Austrian, or Turkish bonds, if that is not your idea, as I understood the Senator to say a while ago that the bill did authorize the taking of German bonds and Austrian bonds——

Mr. SMOOT. It authorizes the taking of bonds from any country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, what other bonds are being considered? What bonds are running through the mind of the Senator, or through the mind of the author, or through the mind of the promoter of this bill? No other bonds have been mentioned except the bonds of these three countries. The Allies have no other bonds of other foreign countries, except those of Germany, Austria, and Turkey, which bonds they are now receiving as reparations.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will let me proceed just a moment——

Mr. SMOOT. There are Belgian bonds, which I think the Senator will say are perfectly good.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, Belgium owes us a large amount of money.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly. If she did not, we would not have any of her bonds.

Mr. McKELLAR. We have not any now.

Mr. SMOOT. We will have.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope so. I hope the Senator's administration will do better than my own administration did in the securing of these bonds as directed by law.

Mr. SMOOT. There are the Italian bonds, there are the Polish bonds, and there are the bonds of those little independent countries to which we have advanced money, but nobody knows whether there will be a transfer of a single bond from any of those countries. If, however, we are going to pass a law giving the Secretary the power to clean up this whole question, if we have not confidence in him that he will look out for the interests of the Government of the United States, then we should not pass the law at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator from Utah, who is a careful legislator, if he does not think it would have been far wiser for the Secretary of the Treasury to come before Congress with a plan of what he proposed, so that Congress in the first place and the people of the United States might know what he proposed to do, instead of asking for this blanket authority by which he could take the German or Austrian or Turkish bonds at par for the English bonds at par? I do not know what English bonds are selling at to-day. Will the Senator inform me?

Mr. SMOOT. They are now selling about on the same basis as our own bonds.

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite as good?

Mr. SMOOT. A little better, in some cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. Or a little better. Now, what are German bonds sold for?

Mr. SMOOT. There are very few German bonds. Germany has not any bonds to speak of. Germany has a floating debt of paper money.

Mr. McKELLAR. Germany is issuing bonds to the Allies almost every day of every month, and I doubt if those bonds would sell on the market for 20 cents on the dollar; and yet under this bill if it should be enacted into law, the Secretary of the Treasury could take the English indebtedness and substitute for it the bonds that England has received in reparation and turn them over to us. Right here let me say that Germany owes us several hundred million dollars on her own account, and when we get this it will probably have to be taken in bonds and this will probably give us all the German bonds we want.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, wait one moment. I hope the Senator will let me proceed just a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator asked me if I did not think it would have been the best thing for the Secretary of the Treasury to have had a plan, and to have presented it here, before asking for the introduction of the bill. I should like to answer that question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I did ask the Senator that question, and I should like to have him answer it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the Finance Committee of the Senate are not going to report this bill to the Senate until after they have had the Secretary of the Treasury and other officials of that department before them. We are going to know exactly what the Secretary has in mind, and it will be in the shape of a hearing that every Senator and every Congressman and every citizen of the United States will know about without a question of doubt.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it for granted that it does not follow, because this bill was introduced by the chairman of the Finance Committee, that the committee are going to report the bill just as it is. I have not any doubt but that there will be amendments to it; and I know that the committee are not going to report it to this body until they have had a hearing and know just what the intentions are if the law passes and what the result will be.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to have that assurance from the Senator from Utah. Eleven billion dollars is too much money to dispose of in the way set forth in this bill.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that if the committee does report out this bill and the Congress does pass it just as it is now, the Secretary of the Treasury will have the right to accept German bonds and Austrian bonds and Turkish bonds in lieu of the $11,000,000,000 of indebtedness that is now due us by our allies. The result of such an exchange would be substantially that in the end we would pay $11,000,000,000 of the German indemnity. That is what it would mean in dollars and cents, or thereabouts. We might get some little driblets from Germany or from Austria or from Turkey, but the result of it would be to swap this perfectly good indebtedness against the Allies—I think the English bonds are absolutely good, as good bonds as there are in the world except the bonds of the United States Government—for the practically worthless bonds of those three nations that were defeated in the late war, and that we helped to defeat. There can be no other purpose in that provision of the bill to which I have referred, and which I have quoted, unless it was intended by some one connected with our Government to accept some German or Austrian or Turkish bonds for English indebtedness or French indebtedness or Italian indebtedness or Belgian indebtedness, which indebtednesses are all perfectly good.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not really mean for a minute, does he, by what he says, that if this bill should become a law $11,000,000,000 worth of good bonds would be exchanged for German bonds?

Mr. McKELLAR. I say that under the wording of this bill the Secretary of the Treasury would have the right to exchange at par the $11,000,000,000 of the indebtedness due us by our allies for reparation bonds of Germany, Austria, or Turkey, and I will state to the Senator my reasons. There can not be a doubt about it, and I am sure the Senator will admit it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct in that. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator doubts it, I will read it again.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah has already stated several times that that authority is given, but the Senator from Tennessee made the statement that we would have $11,000,000,000 worth of worthless bonds in exchange for bonds that were good. No Secretary of the Treasury of the United States would ever think of doing such a thing. I can not imagine that a man coming directly from an insane asylum would do it; and I may say, further, that if any Secretary of the Treasury undertook to do it, I have not any doubt at all but that he would be stopped immediately by action of Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then why give him the power to do this very thing, as this bill does? Mr. President, I think that after Congress formally gives him the power to do it, under the peculiar circumstances which surround these obligations it would be very difficult for Congress ever to take that power away from him. If a Congress were so subservient to the Executive power as to give such an authority as this, that Congress would be servile enough and subservient enough to uphold him in what he does in the matter even if he were to cancel the indebtedness. Why give the power if it is not intended that it shall be used? What is the purpose of it? Why such secrecy about this foreign indebtedness anyway?

Mr. President, it has been almost like opening a hickory log with a crowbar to get any information about these bonds out of either the past or the present administration. I wrote the Secretary of the Treasury last fall repeatedly to get information, but I could never get any accurate information, and none at all as to the purposes of the Government. Invariably the reply was, "You see my annual report." And when you would look at his annual report you would find there was no real information in it about these debts. I asked for specific information, and no information was given until I brought my resolution up in the Senate, and then a kind of information was given.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment. No real information was given. Why this secrecy about these foreign debts? Why are not our executive officers following out the plain directions of the statute which is in force now? Why have they not taken bonds for those indebtednesses instead of having merely the I O U's of the foreign Governments for them? There never was a business transaction handled in a less businesslike way. There is not a bond in the Treasury, as I understand, representing those debts; they are all in the shape of I O U's. There are four billions and a quarter of I O U's from Great Britain, and just a certificate of indebtedness of four billion and a quarter, so we are told. This act under which we loaned the money provided that the Secretary of the Treasury should take bonds, with coupons attached, running 30 years, just as our bonds did, and not one thing has been done by the Treasury Department to carry out the plain provisions of that statute, and when you ask them about it they say, "Oh, well, we are going to see about it. We are going to have an interview with Ambassador Geddes about it. The English Government is going to make good their promises; they are going to pay the interest after a while." We see interviews with noted English statesmen about it, but they have done nothing about it; and the first step that has been taken by the administration since the debts were incurred looking to a settlement is this step which we are considering to-day, which authorizes our Government to accept German, Austrian, and Turkish bonds at par, if thought advisable, for the indebtedness we hold against those nations.

Mr. Winston Churchill, indeed, said some time ago that Great Britain was going to begin paying her interest to us in the fall, but his statement seems to have fallen on deaf ears in our Government, for their first utterance about it is this resolution which gives Great Britain the right to substitute her German reparation bonds for the amounts due us by Great Britain.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply wanted to observe, in connection with the Senator's remarks, that if the authority is given the Secretary of the Treasury to do this thing, it would not avail us anything to keep in mind the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that Congress might stop him, because the thing might be done before Congress would know about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. And we would be committed.

Mr. FLETCHER. And the whole matter would be closed.

Mr. McKELLAR. If one-tenth of the secrecy prevails in the future about this indebtedness that has prevailed in the past, no doubt it would be done before Congress knew anything about it. There seems to be some marvelous cause of secrecy about this indebtedness, and our own officials decline to give the Congress any information about it or about their plans in regard to it. I have not asked the present Secretary of the Treasury about it. I know that official very pleasantly. I admire him. I have had such confidence in him that I thought that at this time in our history, when we are taxing the people as never before, when we need the money as we have never needed it before in this country, the present Secretary of the Treasury would take steps for the prompt funding of this indebtedness into bonds, and take prompt steps to collect the interest on it. I am deeply disappointed that he has not done so. I am deeply disappointed that he is published as favoring this bill.

I say to my Republican friends that the burden is upon you for legislation. You promised the people to reduce taxation. You are not doing it. I call your attention to the fact that there are but two possible ways in which you can reduce taxation in this country at this time. One is by the collection of the interest on this ten or eleven billion dollars of foreign indebtedness. The interest on it will amount to $500,000,000 a year in round figures, which will be one-ninth of the taxation we impose if we spend $4,500,000,000 per year. If you will collect that interest you can reduce taxes one-ninth.

It is perfectly plain if you go ahead and do it. If your Secretary of the Treasury will go on and carry out the plain direction of the present law, you will be enabled to reduce taxation one billion out of every nine. It is a simple thing. If you want to reduce taxation on the American people, collect these just and overdue interest charges. Our allies are amply able to pay them, just as able as our own people who will have to pay them in the way of taxes unless you do collect them. Every dollar you collect in interest you to that extent will relieve the American taxpayer. Every dollar you fail to collect you thereby and to that extent increase the burden of taxation on the American people. Do not throw this money away as is proposed by this bill.

Great Britain has already announced that she is going to pay her interest, and so far as the public knows has not even asked us to accept any of her German bonds, which may or may not be worth anything. I have no doubt when Great Britain begins to pay her interest, if we simply ask her to pay it, every other nation, except Russia perhaps, will at once begin to pay its interest, and I believe even Russia will be glad to pay her interest. Nobody is insisting on the payment of principal of the debts, but only the interest, which, at a very low rate, the same rate we are paying on our bonds, amounts to $500,000,000 a year, and if you gentlemen want to reduce taxation, that is your one best opportunity.

There is one other opportunity to reduce taxation, and it is the only other opportunity you have. That other opportunity is to reduce expenditures of the Government. You have not shown any signs that you are going to reduce expenditures this year or next. You are indulging in the most extravagant appropriations, you are appropriating money almost like it was war time. The truth is that it looks as if your expenditures for the coming year are going to be greater than ever before. It looks as if they might run over $5,000,000,000.

You can reduce taxation by reducing expenditures. The truth of the matter is that after paying interest on all our indebtedness we should not expend over three billion and a half a year. If you will collect this interest of five hundred million a year, that will reduce our needed appropriations to $3,000,000,000 a year. We should not spend a dollar over that three billion for the next year or two, and then we should gradually reduce it. If you reduce the expenditures of this Government to $3,000,000,000 a year, you can reduce taxation. Those are the only two ways you can reduce taxation now. You will go before this country in the next campaign, having promised the country to reduce taxation, without having fulfilled the promise, unless you do those two things, and you will have to do both of those things. You will have to collect the interest on the foreign indebtedness that is due us and apply it to the expenditures for running our Government, and you will have to reduce the expenditures of the Government.

There is no use talking about reducing taxation otherwise, because you can not do it. My friends, unless you do those two things, the question before you when you frame your next revenue bill will be, not how you can take off taxes but where we are going to get additional subjects of taxation to raise money with which to carry on our Government. It is a plain question. It is right up to you; it is not up to us on this side of the aisle. It is a matter for you to determine.

Mr. President, I protest with all the earnestness of which I am capable against this bill. I say to the Senator from Utah that I hope that provision which gives the Secretary of the Treasury the right to substitute German and Austrian and Turkish bonds for the bonds of such nations as England and France and Italy and Belgium will be stricken from that bill. It should not be in it. It is a power which no good President or no good Secretary ought to want, and it is a power which no bad President or no bad Secretary ought to have, to use the words of another. It should not be in the bill, and I hope the committee will report unanimously against this bill.

Mr. President, I can not conceive any good reason why this interest should not be collected, and collected speedily. As I said before, Great Britain has already announced publicly, through the proper financial officers of her Government, that she is willing to pay her interest, amounting to $225,000,000 a year. England is not a welcher on her debts. She borrowed this money in good faith. She got good money from us. It saved her Empire. The contract under which she borrowed it was and is plain. Publicly she is not seeking to evade that contract. Publicly she has not asked us to permit her to substitute German bonds for her own bonds. Surely she is not undertaking to do secretly what she would not do publicly. France is recovering, and has recovered to a remarkable degree. I heard some one say the other day who had been through the regions of France devastated during the war that you could hardly tell a war had been carried on there; that there never have been such wonderful improvements. The French people are an honorable people and a splendid people; they are an industrious people; they are a frugal people; they are a debt-paying people; and I do not believe, unless it is by reason of the connivance of some of our own officers—and that I can not believe—that France will ever repudiate her debt to the United States. I do not believe Italy will attempt to repudiate her debts to us or to give us worthless bonds for it. I do not believe Belgium will repudiate her debts to us. I know that Great Britain will not repudiate her debt, unless we help her to do it. This bill is an effort to help our late allies to repudiate their debts and give us a lot of worthless bonds for them.

We all know that Germany has settled with the Allies. She has not settled with us, because we will not settle with her. She does not trade with us because we will not trade with her. She can not have anything to do with us because we will not have anything to do with her, though she has settled up with all those who fought her except ourselves. We hold accounts against her now for upward of $250,000,000. We should enter into a treaty of peace with her. We should take her bonds for what she owes us for maintaining our army over there. We should not let our allies substitute their other German bonds for the indebtedness due us. I can not understand why our President, acting under his perfectly plain constitutional authority, does not enter into a treaty of peace with Germany instead of fiddling along here with rival congressional peace resolutions that would mean absolutely nothing if passed.

Mr. President, we all know that the allied nations have received bonds in reparation from Germany, and they have those bonds. They can not dispose of them, they can not handle them, probably, as they want, and they might, indeed, want to unload them on the United States, and this bill introduced by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania gives those nations an opportunity to unload those worthless bonds of Germany and her allies upon the United States.

It would have been better for us to have just handed over to Germany $10,000,000,000 in the beginning, and dropped it there, without going into the war, than to take such a step as this. We might as well have bought our peace at the outset as to pay for it after the war is over. Is there any red-blooded American who would have thought for a moment of buying our peace at such a price? Yet that is proposed in this bill, deliberately proposed; and I understand it has the approval of the President of the United States, though I hope it has not. Knowing President Harding as I do, I can not conceive how he would ever give his approval to a proposition of this kind. He is an honest man, and I do not see how he could for one moment give his approval to any such financial scheme as would permit this Government to take the worthless bonds of the Central Powers off the hands of the Allies and give up perfectly good indebtedness which we now hold against those allies.

Mr. President, I hope Senators will read this bill. I hope they will read the law governing these loans, which law I hold in my hand and which will be put in the RECORD. I hope, very sincerely, that the British Government, which is not in the habit of laying down on its contracts, will look again at the contracts under which they borrowed this money, those exceedingly favorable contracts under which they borrowed this money, and that they will not connive at evading their debts or take any steps that would permit them to swap those worthless bonds for a perfectly good indebtedness which the United States holds against the British Government.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the very able and timely speech of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. As he proceeded with his speech I thought of the old saying that "we should be just before we are generous." Nearly three years have come and gone since our boys ended the World War in victory. We have found time to legislate on nearly every subject under the sun except the one of making a just and fair settlement with the American soldiers who offered themselves a living sacrifice on foreign battle fields for us.

What is the situation to-day? We find the Congress dilly-dallying with this subject all-important to the boys, suggesting a confusing and complicated settlement with them some time in the dim and mysterious future. It would be infinitely better for the Senate and the House to postpone action on other things and fail in their duty on many other legislative matters rather than continue this policy of seeming indifference to the brave boys who dared and endured so much for us. There can be no excuse for the body that declared war and directed that these boys be taken out of the peaceful walks of life and sent across the sea to do and to die for our liberties to further delay favorable action on the matter of paying the boys what is justly due them. Congress must not fail in its obligation to them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Rather than give up the bonds representing the $11,000,000,000 of indebtedness to our former allies, or rather than have substituted for that perfectly good indebtedness the worthless bonds of the defeated powers, does not the Senator from Alabama think it would be very much wiser for us to take the bonds of England and France and Italy and Belgium and the other nations and divide some of them up with the soldiers who fought to save the civilization of the world?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, my good friend, the able Senator from Tennessee, has anticipated the line of argument that I intended making. I heartily agree with him. It would be infinitely better for the Government to take $1,000,000,000 or whatever amount is necessary of the foreign debt and use it to square the account with the American boys who struck the decisive blow in ending the great World War.

It comes with poor grace from Senators to even suggest at this time a course which practically means the cancellation of the debts due to us by foreign nations. Let us be just to the American soldier before we display charity and generosity toward the nations that borrowed from us ten billions of American money.

It would be more in keeping with sound business principles for us to require a portion of this indebtedness to be paid at an early date and use the money thus collected in satisfying the country's financial obligation to its soldiers. What excuse have Senators to offer as to why this money should be left with the nations of the Old World when many of the boys here at home are out of employment and some of them suffering for the actual necessities of life.

The interest on this indebtedness is over $400,000,000 a year. Are we not going to be permitted to collect the interest? The tax burden is heavy upon the backs of the American people and you are going to increase it. What right have we to make gifts to foreign countries of money justly due by them to this Government when we are increasing the burdens of the people here at home. Charity should begin at home.

If the Federal Reserve Board fails and refuses to grant extensions of loans to the farmers of the South and West at a lower rediscount rate, it would be well to take some of the money due us by foreign countries and lend it at the same rate of interest now granted to those countries to the great agricultural interests of the South and West. We loaned this money to our allies, and I am not complaining about that. We were in the midst of the greatest war that ever cursed the world. We were moving heaven and earth to put down the great disturber of the world's peace, and we did it. We let Europe have that money at a rate of interest far below the rate of interest now exacted of the farmers of the United States by the ruling of the Federal Reserve Board. We hear the suggestion made that we should cancel the debt of foreign countries, which would mean the giving away of billions of dollars, and yet the agricultural industry of the United States is unable to obtain money sufficient to save it from utter ruin.

In the West and in the South our people were told that for five years following the war business would be good and that the world would need and would take all that our enterprise and industry could produce. Senators will recall that. The South and West went on producing, meeting the requirements of our own country and those of other countries. Now, in the third year following the war, a year following two prosperous years, the first two after the war, what is the situation? Our foreign trade relations are rent and torn, and foreign trade that should now be ours is going elsewhere, all because we threw away the opportunity to join with our allies in establishing a new order in the world. What a crime against our own country and the world when we failed to take our place in an association of nations or League of Nations and set up a just and stable international tribunal through which we could have assured peace and satisfactory trade relations with the nations of the earth. If we had gone into such an agreement, I verily believe that conditions would now be quite different at home and abroad. American bankers were anxious to extend, and would have extended, credits to foreign countries. This money would have been paid for American products and would never have gone out of the country. These countries want and need everything that we produce. We want and could have had the foreign markets that such an arrangement would have afforded. But we failed miserably to meet the requirements of our national and international duty on that momentous occasion, and here we are, Mr. President, still standing aloof from the nations of the earth.

The United States is forced by those in authority to stand afar off in foolish isolation while business here at home is paralyzed as seven men pervert the law and show partiality and favoritism, as they control the credit and money supply of the whole country. That is the miserable condition that afflicts the American people to-day, and what are we doing to relieve them?

You Republicans told us in the campaign last fall that you were going to establish an association of nations or some sort of an international arrangement, but you have not kept your promise. I am ready to vote for some sort of an association. I do not care whether you call it a league of nations or an association of nations. I want my country to take her place where she rightfully belongs among the nations of the earth; I want her to occupy the place which, under God, she is entitled to occupy in the great family of nations. She belongs at the forefront. I believe that she was intended to lead the nations of the earth in the things that make for peace, prosperity, and happiness in the world.

Senators of the majority side, you are on trial before the people of the country. Do not think that because your party carried the last election by 7,000,000 majority that the people will now support and follow you blindly. Public opinion in this country changes quickly when the people realize that they have been deceived and imposed upon by those whom they placed in power, and trusted. You told them that we would soon become a member of some sort of an international tribunal through which our interests would all be safeguarded and protected. Eight months have gone since you carried the election last fall, and yet you have done nothing to make good that promise to the people. We were told last fall that if you carried the election that the announcement of that fact would help business all over the country, and that as soon as you got into power the people would get prosperity, but instead of that they got deeper and deeper into the mire of financial distress and disaster. The prosperity that you produced was the kind that they did not want. It was the kind that brought despondency to the people and destruction to their business.

Last fall in the cotton-growing States it cost $40 to gather, haul, gin, and place bagging and ties on a single bale of cotton—I am not now taking into account the cost of preparing the soil for planting, the fertilizer used, the labor employed, and the money invested in plow mules and implements. I am leaving out of this calculation the cost of producing the crop, which was from 25 to 30 cents a pound—or $125 to $150 a bale. I want to show you just here what it cost to gather a bale of cotton and place it on the market. It cost our farmers $40 a bale. To-day the average price of cotton is below 8 cents a pound, and less than $40 a bale. Senators, can you appreciate what that means to the cotton producers of the United States?

All that the farmer invested and expended in cotton production last year is gone as a total loss if he is forced to sell his cotton at the low and ruinous price now paid. Will the Government stand by and see the business of agriculture in the cotton-growing States pillaged and plundered in this fashion?

The Government can, by an extension of loans at a reasonable rate of interest, deliver the South and West out of the hands of those who are fattening upon their misfortune.

The aid that we ask is a safe and sound business proposition. We want the Federal Reserve Board to be as fair and as accommodating to the agricultural interests of the South as it has been, and is to-day, to the interests of Wall Street in the East. The Government has it in its power to direct the Federal Reserve Board to order an extension of time on loans in the cotton-growing States. This can be done without the loss of a dollar. This has been done before and the business of the producer was saved from serious embarrassment and tremendous financial losses. The loans were paid, the accounts were all squared, and the producer was permitted to hold his cotton until he could sell it at a price that would yield a profit. Mr. President, if the Federal Reserve Board permits the cotton loans to be called now it will destroy the business of millions of American cotton producers. Then, what will happen? After they have been forced to sacrifice their cotton, the price will advance and the producers will wonder why they were not allowed to keep their cotton and sell it when the price advanced, and thus be in position to pay off the loans that would have saved their business from ruin. The situation that confronts us is no ordinary one. It did not arise out of the natural course of business in normal times.

It was born of conditions produced by the World War and augmented by a short-sighted foreign policy on the part of the Government of the United States.

Having enjoyed prosperity for the first two years following the war, there was nothing to indicate to the farmers, merchants, and bankers of the cotton-growing States that a course would be pursued that would literally destroy our trade relations with foreign countries. Whether the war or a hurtful policy of the Government produced these terrible conditions, it is certain that the people now suffering sorely in the cotton-growing States are in no way responsible for them and ought not, under the circumstances, to be made to suffer the tremendous losses that will come if the cotton loans are called. If the Federal Reserve Board permits these loans to be called at this time, what will happen? The farmer will be forced to dump his cotton upon the market at an average price of $35 or $40 a bale. This amount is less than a third of what it cost to produce a bale of cotton. If the speculators and gamblers can force this cotton out of the hands of the producer, they will get it at a low price and hold it until the price advances to $75 or $100 a bale, and maybe more.

The business of the producer will have been destroyed and the consumer will not be benefited. They intend to rob the producer with one hand and hold up the consumer with the other. Will the Government do the right and just thing and extend a helping hand and save the cotton producer from the financial disaster which threatens, or will it permit the great cotton industry of the United States to be sacrificed when it has the power to save that industry and prevent great distress and suffering in the cotton-growing States?

In the West the woolgrowers and the grain producers are crying out for deliverance from those who insist upon forcing them to pay loans when the price of their products is not sufficient to do so. They are protesting against the high rediscount rate charged by the Federal reserve banking system. Seven per cent rediscount is charged against American farmers and we are lending money to the Allies at less than 5 per cent. Mr. President, I think that this Government should be just to its own people before it is generous to the people of foreign countries. There is more money in the United States to-day than ever before.

The Federal Reserve Board has it in its power to come to the rescue of the farmers of the South and West. It can grant an extension of time on loans and relieve a very critical and distressing situation. If these loans are called, the situation in the cotton-growing States will be desperate.

I known that the Federal Reserve Board can do the thing necessary to relieve the situation, and I am hoping and praying that it will. If it fails and refuses to do so and permits these loans to be called in the face of market conditions that exist to-day it will be guilty of murder. The rumor that these loans would be called has already caused the death of a number of bankers and business men in the South. Mr. President, if this call is made I fear that many more will follow in the footsteps of those unfortunate ones who have already gone down to death because of the unfair administration of the Federal reserve act. On yesterday the most prominent banker in South Carolina killed himself. Will not the Government see to it that aid is extended to these people who need such aid just now? We have it in our power to go to the rescue of these people. Are we going to do it?

Ask the street car companies of Washington to reduce passenger fares and they say that operating expenses require the present charge. Ask the railroads to reduce freight rates, and they tell you that on account of the high cost of operating freight trains they can not afford to do it. Ask the farmer to sell his cotton at an average price of 8 cents a pound, and he tells you that that price is 22 cents a pound less than it cost him to produce it and that he can not afford to sell at that price. And then what happens? The rumor is heard that loans on cotton are going to be called and the farmer forced to do the thing that will destroy his business. Is there any fairness or justice in such treatment of this great producing class of our people? Again, I say that it is the duty of the Government to direct the Federal Reserve Board to extend the time on cotton loans until market conditions are better.

If these loans are called it will not only work great injury to the cotton-growing States, but it will hurt the merchants and manufacturers of the East. The South is a heavy buyer of your manufactured products, and just now this trade is paralyzed. The South buys goods from your merchants and when you destroy her purchasing power you injure yourselves. As I said a day or two ago, we buy meat and grain and mules from the West, and when we are denied money with which to carry on our business—money with which to buy the things you have to sell—your business, as well as ours, is seriously injured. Are these loans to be called, when to do so will injure the farmers, merchants, and bankers of the South, the merchants and manufacturers of the East, the meat, grain, and mule dealers of the West, and benefit nobody except the cotton gamblers and speculators of Wall Street? Let the Federal reserve banking system serve the purpose for which it was created and furnish the money to meet the needs of legitimate business at a time like this.

The hoarding of all our gold supply and the keeping of money out of circulation, along with the curtailing of legitimate credits, at a time like this is a crime against the enterprise, the industry, and business of the American people.

The Federal reserve banking system was created for the purpose of meeting any and every emergency that might arise. It was intended to meet the needs of every legitimate business in the country. It was never intended that it should be used to cripple and kill legitimate business, but that is just what it will do if it forces the loans to be called on cotton. Half of the population of the United States living in the South and West are calling in vain to the Federal Reserve Board for aid at this hour.

Will an extension of time be given on our cotton loans in the South, or has the decree gone forth that the farmers, merchants, and bankers of the South are to be sacrificed at the behest of the cotton gamblers and speculators of Wall Street?

Mr. President, we went out on the stump in this country and exhorted the people to buy Liberty bonds. We displayed these beautiful bonds and said, "Here they are; they are worth 100 cents on the dollar; they will never sell below par; you can make no better investment; come with your money; buy these bonds; the country needs your help and the bonds are as good as gold." And what happened? Why, the people responded. Young and old came and bought bonds from a sense of patriotic duty. They were not able to buy, many of them, as an investment. They bought these bonds to help the Government in the hour of distress and sore trial. What is happening to-day with these same bonds? They are selling at a discount of $15 on $100. Liberty bonds! God save the mark! We told the people in our speeches, "The boys are bleeding and dying over yonder; here is a casualty list; read it (some are from your State and some are from mine); wounded on the battle field in France and borne back on a litter to the hospital; buy these bonds, men and women!" The hearts of our people were stirred and they came to the country's rescue; they bought the bonds; and now what do we see? A poor old woman, right here in Washington, who had bought a $50 bond, saving so much a week to pay for it, was forced to sell it the other day for $37.50. Bond sharks are roaming the country, taking advantage of the distress of those who stinted themselves and borrowed money to buy these bonds to enable their country to win the war. What a sad and miserable spectacle; we behold those at home who served the country best in the hour of its peril now being made to suffer by a policy inaugurated by those in charge of the big banking instrumentalities of the Government.

Liberty bonds as good as gold! Let us see about that. Uncle Johnny in the cotton-growing States goes to the bank and says, "I have some Liberty bonds—$100 bonds—and I want to borrow some money on them." The banker says, "I am very sorry, but the bonds have gone down, and there is so much uncertainty about them that the Federal reserve system will not loan any more money on them." Then Uncle Johnny goes home a disappointed man and sits down at his fireside at night and recalls the speeches made in which he was told that the Liberty bonds were worth 100 cents on the dollar and that they were as good as gold. The next day he goes to town and he meets a broker, and he says, "I can not borrow money on my Liberty bonds and I am forced to sell them. What will you give me for them?" "I will give $80 for your $100 bond." There are instances where these bonds could not be sold for $75 on the hundred. Uncle Johnny says, "These are interest-bearing bonds and I gave $100 in hard-earned money for $100 worth of them, and now I can not get what I gave for them and I can not borrow money at the bank on them; my notes are due, and I am told that they are going to call my loan, and if that is done I will have to sell my cotton at an average price of 8 cents a pound, when it cost me 30 cents a pound to produce it." Senators, that is the situation in the cotton-growing States. Will the Government be a party to a scheme that will deny loans on Government bonds and force people who own those bonds to sell them way below par and force them at the same time to throw their cotton upon such a demoralized market as that which exists to-day? Wall Street is especially favored. Wall Street never lacks for money to carry on its gambling deals. The "bear" speculator beating down the price of cotton can get every dollar that he wants; but the "bull" comes out and says, "I know that cotton is selling for 22 cents a pound less than it cost to produce it, but I can not get a dollar to help cotton reach a fair and reasonable price."

Mr. President, cotton handkerchiefs made out of one bale of cotton costing $40 retail for $750 to-day. Low-quartered shoes made of cotton and selling here in Washington at $7 per pair will make a bale of cotton for which the farmer received $40 worth $2,100 to the dealer and shoe manufacturer.

Does it seem fair to browbeat the cotton producer, to gag and hamstring him and force him to sell cotton at $40 a bale to pay loans that can be extended without losing a dollar on them? That bunch of "bear" gamblers on the cotton exchange, with fake "bulls" from their own ranks, go through the performance each day of selling and buying cotton, with no pressure on the part of the "bulls," and with the "bears" beating the price down and down, getting every dollar they want for their devilish purposes. That is the system we have to-day.

The farmers of the West are in the same condition as are the farmers of the South. Senators, if the South and West will get together in this body and in the other, I believe they can bring about some relief to our people. Those in the East who sit and clip their coupons by reason of the gambling machines, stock and produce exchanges, do not care about giving us relief. Why? Because certain special interests up there profit and fatten upon our misfortune.

Mr. President, if there is a class of people on this earth that are entitled to be prosperous and happy above the rest, it is the great agricultural class of our people. They produce that which feeds and clothes the world, and when they are overtaken by conditions such as those that now sorely distress them it is the duty of the Government to direct the Federal Reserve Board to lower its rediscount rates to the farmers of the South and West and see to it that their loans are not called, that these men are not led to the slaughterhouse and butchered like beeves in the market place in order that somebody may profit by their undoing and their misfortune.

Speaking in part for 30,000,000 of people in the cotton-growing States, I call upon the President to bring pressure to bear upon the Federal Reserve Board to take immediate action to stop the calling of these loans and to reduce the rediscount rate on farm paper at least to the rate charged foreigners for money loaned. If the President should fail, I ask the Congress as a matter of right to come to the rescue of these people, and I want to say to my friends from the West—the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr MCNARY], and others over there who have shown sympathy for the agricultural interests, whether they be in the West or in the South—that I am anxious to work in concert with them to bring about quick and substantial relief to the farmers of the South and West. Let us leave politics out of the question and act as patriotic Americans. Let us get our forces together and stop this thing now and let the people know that we are standing here, Democrats and Republicans, protesting against the unfair and murderous plan of permitting the avaricious sharks, from whatever quarter, to destroy the business of the people of the South and West. I trust that enough Republicans will join us Democrats to save the situation. I appeal to the sense of fairness and justice of every Senator who hears me to-day. In the name of the people who use their skill and energy and who invest their money in producing two-thirds of the world's cotton supply I beg you to help us to obtain at the hands of the Federal Reserve Board a living chance in this time of our great distress. Because of the extraordinary situation that exists I declare to you that the Government owes it to the cotton producers of the United States to see to it that the vultures, the ghouls, and wolves of greed shall not feed and gorge upon the substance of the patriotic people of the South and West sections of these United States.

CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate House concurrent resolution 18, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed and bound a vest-pocket edition of the Congressional Directory, of which there shall be one edition only during each session of Congress.

The preparation, number, style, and distribution of such directory shall be under the control of the Joint Committee on Printing: Provided, however, That the usual number shall not be printed.

Mr. MOSES. I move that the Senate concur in the action of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6320) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. NORRIS, Mr. KENYON, and Mr. KENDRICK conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on May 9 I offered a resolution proposing to amend the rules of the Senate so as to provide for open executive sessions of the Senate in the consideration of treaties and nominations. On May 14 that resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules. On June 20 it was reported adversely by the chairman of the Committee on Rules at the instance of the Committee on Rules. It is now on the calendar, and is Order of Business 137. I hope to have that resolution called up at a very early date; and in the consideration of it I shall propose a substitute, which I desire to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask to have the substitute read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and to insert the following:

That the last sentence of the second paragraph of Rule XXXVII of the Standing Rules of the Senate be amended so as to read as follows:

"At any stage of such proceedings the Senate may, by the concurrence of a majority of the Senators present, remove the injunction of secrecy from a treaty, or proceed with its consideration in open executive session."

Resolved further, That clause 2 of Rule XXXVIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate be amended so as to read as follows:

"2. All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations in executive session concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any such nomination, shall be kept secret. If, however, charges shall be made against a person nominated, the committee may, in its discretion, notify such nominee thereof, but the name of the person making such charges shall not be disclosed. The fact that a nomination has been made, or that it has been confirmed or rejected, shall not be regarded as a secret. At any stage of such proceedings the Senate may, by the concurrence of a majority of the Senators present, remove the injunction of secrecy with respect to a nomination, or proceed with its consideration in open executive session."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say in this connection that I am not fully advised whether or not I shall offer that as a substitute. I hope to do so. I am hopeful that those who have opposed the other resolution will agree to this. I am very hopeful of that.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that he have this resolution referred to the Committee on Rules and let the other matter remain on the calendar. There was considerable discussion, as the Senator will remember, with reference to the former proposition. I think it would be better to have the new resolution go to the committee now.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no particular objection to its going to the committee. The only thing is that the committee might not meet before the other proposition is called up.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can offer it as an amendment when the other proposition is before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. With that understanding, I will let it go to the committee.

I want to say just in this connection that the other resolution that I offered, of course, provides for open executive sessions of the Senate touching nominations as well as in the consideration of treaties. Under the present rules of the Senate with regard to the consideration of treaties, in order to consider them in the open, unanimous consent has to be given. In the consideration of nominations it has to be done by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. So I feel that it would be a step in the right direction if we could have the rules amended so as to provide for the consideration in open executive session of treaties as well as nominations if a majority of the Senators present vote for that action.

I ask, therefore, that the substitute may be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I have offered an amendment to Senate bill 1806. With the general purposes of this bill, the right to clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission with power to lower freight rates on coal during the summer season, I am entirely in accord. I am of the opinion, however, that that power is now vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. President, before proceeding further I suggest the absence of a quorum. I want to call this matter to the attention of a few Members of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gerry	McKellar	Smith
Broussard	Gooding	McKinley	Smoot
Bursum	Harreld	McNary	Stanley
Cameron	Harris	Moses	Sutherland
Capper	Harrison	Nelson	Trammell
Caraway	Heflin	New	Underwood
Curtis	Johnson	Norris	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Watson, Ga.
Elkins	Kellogg	Poindexter	Willis
Fernald	King	Ransdell
Fletcher	Knox	Sheppard
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Simmons

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] are absent from the Chamber on business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. ERNST, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. STERLING answered to their names when called.

Mr. REED, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. WARREN, Mr. PITTMAN, and Mr. BORAH entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the Senators present will listen to the amendment which is to be offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. It is a very important one, and I think Senators should be fully advised as to the merits of the amendment to be offered.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few minutes. The purpose of this bill is essentially laudable. Coal is consumed in much larger quantities for domestic purposes in the winter than in the summer. Coal is transported in cars of peculiar structure, opening at the bottom, suitable for the carriage of coal, but of very few other materials. The demand for coal cars is much greater in winter than in summer. If you have enough coal cars to satisfy the demands of the coal trade from January until April, you will have an immense number of empty and unused cars blocking the sidings and crowding the storage facilities during the summer months. The result is that with an inadequate supply of coal cars you now have a vast number of unused cars at one season of the year and a scarcity of cars at another season of the year.

It is a well-known fact that any machinery, especially of steel, like an engine or car, deteriorates much more rapidly when it is not used than when it is in use. In addition to that, these cars stored on sidetracks, blind sidings, or at any other place where they can be put for the time being can not be protected as they are protected while they are loaded and in motion, and the valuable bearings and other metals on the cars are stolen. So that the car suffers a greater loss and is maintained at a greater expense by the operator when it is not in use than when it is in use, and for that reason it is in the interest of economy in the service that the use of these cars should be equalized, and that the great number of cars that are not used in the summer and are used in the winter should be used all the time. You will not need so many. If the present supply of cars could be equalized so that practically the same number would be used in July as in January, you could approach much more nearly to remedying the shortage of cars in the coal business.

This variation in the demand for coal renders the employment of the miner irregular and uncertain. The present wages paid to coal miners is due to the fact that they are employed only at certain seasons of the year. There are millions of coal miners employed in the winter months who can not, in the nature of things, on account of the diminished demand for coal, be employed in the summer months, and it is thought that if the movement of coal could be equalized over the year great numbers of miners who are unemployed now would be employed under changed conditions. So that this arrangement for the equalization of the transportation of coal, spreading it out over all seasons of the year, is in the interest of the employee, of the mine owner, and of the railroad.

I claim that it is perfectly proper, under the circumstances, to clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power, if it has not the power, to give a reduced rate in order to stimulate transportation. They do that in the case of excursions, and the railroads would be the better judges.

But if this experiment is not successful, if our theory that a reduction in the rates would stimulate the movement of the coal in the summer—and it is only a theory and a guess—is not correct, this bill provides not for any reduction in the freight rates at all but it provides for a manipulation of the freight rates, a matter that has been called lately to my attention. I was under the impression, when the bill was before the committee, that it provided for a seasonal reduction; but a careful reading of the bill shows that it does not provide for a seasonal reduction. It provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission or the railroads may so alter the rates as to add to the winter rates whatever is taken off of the summer rates. If the present rate is 50 cents a ton and you take 10 cents off in August, you put it on in January.

If this experiment should not work and coal should move in the future as it has moved in the past, and you would have 50,000,000 tons of coal moved in August and 100,000,000 moved in January, and you reduced the rate by 10 cents in August and increased it by 10 cents in January, the result would be that the roads would collect 10 cents more on every ton they hauled in January over the amount they collected for what they hauled in August by virtue of that change. The difference between the winter haulage and the summer haulage would be a net gain to the railroads, with the result that the poor man, who can not store his coal, and did not buy it in July, would pay more for it, as the result of the operation of this law, than if the law had never been altered at all, because he would pay the fixed rate, the rate now established as compensatory, plus the difference between the seasonal rate for August and the seasonal rate for January, and the more they lowered it in August, if that did not work, the worse it would be on the man who bought his coal in January.

I do not think that was the purpose of the able Senator who introduced this bill. It was not my understanding of the object when it was before the committee. I know it was not the understanding of persons who were interested in this measure.

There is no doubt in the world that if the plan works the railroads will be enabled to use in June and July and August hundreds of thousands of cars which are now absolutely dead, and which are dead in every August and every July, when their bearings are stolen, with the disintegration that comes from a lack of movement, and the accumulation of dirt and the other deteriorations which come to every unused machine. The railroads will be put to no additional expense for equipment. It is less expensive to transport 50,000,000 tons of coal in July than in January, because it takes less fuel to generate the steam to transport it.

The roads will be able, without buying another dollar's worth of equipment, without employing an additional engineer, without having an additional dollar of overhead charge whatsoever, if the experiment succeeds, to utilize thousands of cars. The railroads with their expert knowledge will know just how far they can afford to make a reduction in order to secure the advantage, and the thing to do is to say to the railroads, "Here is your opportunity. If you wish to utilize your cars that are not in use, we give you the right to ask the Interstate Commerce Commission for a reduction or we give the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to suggest the reduction."

We make it optional with the commission, as I have done by the proposed amendment. If the Interstate Commerce Commission finds that it will not work, they do not have to do it. The proposed amendment simply provides for the striking out of the words "greater or" and empowers the Interstate Commerce Commission at a seasonal period to lower the rates on coal. If it does not do any good, it will not do any harm. It is not compulsory on the commission. It is not compulsory on the railroads. It gives them the right to avail themselves of the opportunity to use these unused cars and no one can be harmed.

Otherwise, if the movement of coal is not so stimulated, anyone can take his pencil and paper and figure that there are 500,000,000 tons of coal transported in the country every year, and if there are 200,000,000 more tons of coal transported in the winter months than in the summer months, by making a difference of 10 cents a ton between the summer and the winter months we have simply added that much to the cost of the transportation of coal in the country, with a probable chance of not doing anyone any good.

It is a defect in the bill which I overlooked at the time it was before the committee, and which I find several other members of the committee have overlooked, and which I believe will cure any objection to the bill. With that amendment I am firmly convinced that the bill will meet the approval of the Senate.

I formally offer the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, line 11, after the words "shall be," strike out the words "greater or," and on page 2 strike out all after the word "periods," in line 1, down to and including the word "designate," in line 7, in the following words:

But which in the judgment of the commission will yield as nearly as may be the same annual revenue for like movement as rates without seasonal variation, to be maintained by carriers as a whole or as a whole in each of such coal rate groups or territories as the commission may from time to time designate for that purpose, or by such carrier or carriers as the commission may designate.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it is my desire to make a few remarks on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, as I think it destroys the effect of the bill; but as I understand it is the desire to have an executive session at this time I shall postpone my remarks until Monday.

REDUCTION OF NAVAL ARMAMENTS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the issue of the Scientific American which has just appeared, bearing upon the question of disarmament. I do not ask to have it read at this time, but that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPROMISE, WITH A BIG STICK.

"Three navies of commanding importance stand in a class by themselves—those of the United States, Great Britain, and Japan. Each of these nations considers a big navy essential for its welfare. The first is a continent and entirely self-supporting—the other two are islands of limited area, and therefore are entirely dependent upon the keeping open of sea communications for their existence. Particularly is this true of Great Britain, since the sea is not only the artery through which flow her supplies of food and raw materials, but it is the only link which binds together the many elements of an empire of some 400,000,000 people. It is for this reason that she has hitherto insisted on possessing a navy of sufficient strength to keep open the sea routes against any possible enemy or combination of enemies.

"We are more happily situated; for so vast is the extent of our country, so varied and abundant are its resources, that even if a combination of enemies could blockade our coasts we could support ourselves indefinitely; and with our great man power and unrivaled productive capacity we could quickly crush any expeditionary force that might land on our shores. The call for a big navy is based upon considerations of our extensive coast line which we must defend, upon the fact that we have the Philippines, Hawaii, and Porto Rico to protect, and the further fact that the Navy now has under its care the second largest merchant fleet in the world.

"The British Admiralty, through its first lord, recently announced that it had abandoned its policy of building a supreme navy, and for the future would be content with a navy equal to any other; that is to say, of the same strength as our own. This momentous abandonment of a policy which has the sanction of centuries of British history behind it was accompanied with the statement that Great Britain refused to regard the growing strength of the United States Navy as any menace to her own security. As proof of the good faith of this pronouncement, Great Britain has cut her naval strength down to the bone, and has scrapped a fleet which is comparable in effective strength to the unbalanced fleet which we possessed in 1914. She has not laid down a ship since the armistice, and has only now authorized four battleships as replacements for her earlier battleships, which are within a year or two of the obsolescent stage.

"Japan has a program of new construction on hand. The ships she is actually building represent only a fair proportional addition to her existing fleet. She has also authorized an additional program for which no appropriations have been made, being stimulated to do this (so her statesmen have said) by the large program of new construction in the United States. Work on the new Japanese program is being held up pending the discussions on disarmament which are now under consideration; Great Britain recently voted a small sum to be expended this year in laying the keels of their proposed four ships.

"President Harding, with the concurrence of both Houses of Congress, purposes to call a conference in which the three nations can gather about the table and arrange for an understanding as to the future size of their respective navies, the amount of new construction to be undertaken, and, probably, for a division of the work of keeping the seven seas open and safe for the traffic of the world.

"'Disarmament' is the generic term by which the object of the conference has been designated. The term is misleading. No advocate of the movement expects or wishes that it should lead to absolute disarmament. Mr. Harding will not call upon the navies concerned to sink their battleships, disband their crews, and dismantle their dockyards. A navy is as essential to a nation as a police force to a city. A better designation would be 'regulated' or 'noncompetitive' armament. Should this be brought about, the mad race of one nation to outstrip another—a competition born of fear and lashed to white heat by national hatred—will end. Distrust will give place to discussion, rabid hate-mongering to calm reason, and the strength of navies will be proportioned to the acknowledged responsibilities and proper commitments of the nations concerned.

"But we must not go into the conference room with a big stick in our hands. Strange to say, there is danger of this; for you may meet both in the Navy Department and in the Senate men who will say: 'Let us complete or insist upon the completion of the whole 1916 program before we enter any conference. That will put us in a strong position, and we can thus bring Japan and Great Britain to our terms.' Could anything be more fatuous—or more naive. As Senator BORAH so aptly said: 'If we enter the conference with our Navy shipbuilding going full blast, Japan will not listen to our words—she will be hearing the clatter of the riveting hammers outside the door.'

"There might be some economic loss if the three nations shut down absolutely for the few months during which the conference met; but we have faith to believe that the loss would be made up a hundredfold in the cutting down of future naval budgets, and a thousandfold in the moral gain to the world at large."

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR SOLDIERS OF THE WORLD WAR.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I saw in a New York paper, I think the Tribune, referring to a visit that I had with the President of the United States, a statement that the President had expressed his opposition to the soldiers' compensation bill and had indicated that he would veto it, and so forth.

I wish to state that any report of that character is worse than a mere fake report. There is not a word of truth in it. The President did not express himself in opposition to the bill in any shape or form. We discussed this matter, we discussed general financial matters, the tariff bill, the raising of revenue, and the matter of bonding the foreign indebtedness, but in no sense did the President express any opposition to the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill.

Mr. KING. The Senator does not mean to convey the impression that the President expressed his approval of the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would hardly ask the President to approve the bill until it came to him, and I would hardly expect him to state to me that he expected to approve it until he knew what was before him.

Mr. KING. But the Senator does not mean to give the country the impression that the President of the United States is backing the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; the bill comes from Congress, and the President will exercise his discretion upon it when it comes before him. When it gets before him I do not think we need be afraid of the result.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord God, Thou who hast made all of the paths of life to spring from Thy judgment throne of might and mercy, come unto us. Thou who hast put music into the world and set the bright light of eternal day in the skies of our hope, hear us. In a high and blessed sense make it easier for us to laugh than to cry. And may the glad heart be the rule and the sighing breast the exception. Make every valley a flowing well of life and promise and every mount an altar of praise and sacrifice. And may we not be afraid to trust God now, henceforth, and forever. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1837.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1837, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1837) to amend section 32 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] has 30 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] 39 minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR].

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on yesterday one of the Members, who said he would not vote for the bill under consideration, gave as his reason for not doing so that the United States Government was running behind in its finances and that our expenditures were exceeding our income. This seems to be a common misapprehension that exists in a great many parts of our country, and especially in the financial districts of our country. But instead of running behind in our expenditures we are actually not only keeping well within our income but reducing our national debt in a manner that must be most gratifying to those who are responsible for the management of our Government finances.

The Wall Street Journal, which ought to have accurate information regarding the finances of this country, has been one of the periodicals which has constantly and continuously given out misinformation, and even to-day the following paragraph appears in its issue:

Total tax and miscellaneous collections this year will be more than $5,000,000,000, Treasury officials believe, with expenditures running slightly below this amount. The Government, these reports indicate, is beginning to live within its income for the first time in several years.

The Government is not only living within its income now, but has been living within its income for nearly two years, during which time our national debt has been decreased nearly $2,500,000,000. So far this fiscal year our receipts have been $5,507,000,000, and yet, notwithstanding this, the Wall Street Journal to-day states that our collections this year will be more than $5,000,000,000, "Treasury officials believe," and that in face of the fact that to-day our income is 10 per cent more than the amount reported by the Wall Street Journal.

The excess of ordinary receipts over ordinary disbursements so far this year have been $583,000,000. Our excess of receipts over disbursements last year was something like $600,000,000. Among the other totals that have gone to make up the reduction in the public debt have been between $700,000,000 and $800,000,000 which has been returned to the Government by the Grain Corporation and by the War Finance Board. So that as far as our receipts and disbursements are concerned, affecting the financial condition of the Government, there should be no objection to the enactment of this bill into law.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNBAR. Gladly.

Mr. FESS. While I would not offer that as an objection to the bill, yet is it not a little embarrassing to us that while our income is larger than our outgo the income is still from a war taxation system?

Mr. DUNBAR. The income is not altogether on a war taxation basis. At one time the flat normal business tax was 12 per cent and 6 per cent. That was for the year 1918, when the war closed. Since that time those taxes have been upon a basis of 8 per cent and 4 per cent. In other words, flat normal business tax was 50 per cent more than it is at the present time.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman make that statement as an accurate statement?

Mr. DUNBAR. As an accurate statement.

Mr. FESS. That our war taxation was 50 per cent more than it is now?

Mr. DUNBAR. We now pay a tax of 4 per cent on the first $4,000 above exemption.

Mr. FESS. That is only one form of the tax. That is income only.

Mr. DUNBAR. It is the largest Government income that we have. Of course, the internal-revenue tax on other items of income has not been decreased.

Mr. FESS. I think my friend will agree with me that our taxing system was born out of the stress of war and that we do not want to continue the present system if it is possible to change it.

Mr. DUNBAR. We do not want to continue the present system in all of its features.

Mr. FESS. And the mere fact that under the present system we are getting more money than we are paying for running the Government is not to me a satisfactory statement that our finances are in the best possible condition.

Mr. DUNBAR. They are not in the best possible condition, but under the circumstances I do not see how they could have been expected to be in a better condition.

Mr. FESS. That may be true.

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes.

Mr. FESS. However, all of us are distressed over the fact that we still have an uneconomic system of taxation, born out of war conditions.

Mr. DUNBAR. That is true, but I do not see how you could expect anything else; how we could go into a war that cost $40,000,000,000 and expect immediately after the war to have a tax system that is not to some extent at least based upon uneconomic conditions.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman's question answers itself. We could not do it.

Mr. DUNBAR. But I am in favor of a revision of the income tax, and I believe that every Member of this House is in favor of a revision. A revision will be made, and I think that it is generally understood that the entire excess-profits tax will be removed, and I think it should be removed. I believe that a great deal of what Secretary Mellon terms as a "nuisance tax" should be repealed, and that it will be repealed. But I want to say to the gentlemen of this House that I do not believe that we should seriously consider a reduction in our income tax. I believe that a man who has an income of $50,000 a year can well afford to pay a sum of money into the Treasury of this Government which is less than $10,000.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman yield again there?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the gentleman that I would not reduce the income tax unless by reducing it we get more tax than by keeping it at the high rate. It strikes me that if we keep the upper range of the income tax until we accumulate a larger surplus than under the present system it would be well.

Mr. DUNBAR. Well, let us reduce our taxes after the surplus begins to accumulate. With the surplus that has now accumulated I think we can safely repeal the excess-profits tax which Secretary Mellon estimates for the calendar year will amount to $450,000,000.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman see any way by which we can repeal the transportation tax, which seems to be one very burdensome item of taxation?

Mr. DUNBAR. I believe that item amounts to about $350,000,000.

Mr. FESS. $330,000,000.

Mr. DUNBAR. I think it is approximately $350,000,000. We can repeal that tax and still have revenues sufficient to pay the operating expenses of our Government upon the present basis of taxation. With the exception of the income derived from the tax that the gentleman has just mentioned and the tax which we have been receiving, due to the excess-profits taxes, we could still operate and have sufficient finances to run this Government and also reduce our national debt.

Mr. Chairman, I want to tell you, sir, that there has never been any occasion for the distress and alarm and apprehension which in so many parts of the United States has been manifested, and I can not help but believe that it emanated from sources which have not analyzed Government receipts and expenditures.

We are in a position on account of the record of economy made by the Sixty-sixth Congress, and which will be repeated in the Sixty-seventh, the present Congress, to reduce taxation and provide for the efficient administration of affairs. Our Democratic friends have often told us that if we were an economical Congress, taxes should be reduced. They have failed to take into consideration that up until the meeting of the Sixty-sixth Congress in May, 1919, a Republican Congress, the expenses of the Government were continually increasing, and largely in excess of income; but after the Sixty-sixth Congress had been in session for four months governmental expenses began to decrease at the rate of $500,000,000 each succeeding three months, and this ratio was continued for the balance of the then fiscal year. The peak of our Government indebtedness was reached in August, 1919, amounting to $25,478,592,113.25. On June 30, the end of the present fiscal year, it will amount to approximately $23,000,000,000, making a reduction in our national debt in less than two years' time of approximately $2,500,000,000. The principal objection to the reduction of taxes was the menace attending a large floating indebtedness which, in August, 1919, amounted to approximately $4,000,000,000. This has been reduced approximately $1,500,000,000. It should be the purpose of the Treasury Department to have this floating indebtedness converted into some long-term indebtedness so that the menace attending this continued renewal of Government indebtedness should cease to exist.

Governmental expenses for the last two fiscal years and the estimated expenses for the coming fiscal year have been and are estimated for 1922 to be as follows:

1921 expenses to June 21, 1921	4,908,983,918.87
Estimated expenses for the remainder of the month	100,000,000.00
Making a total of	5,008,983,918.87
Estimated expenses for the fiscal year 1922	3,800,000,000.00

The above tells the story of economy. When it is considered that the disbursements for the year 1922 requires approximately $1,000,000,000 for interest on our public debt; $550,000,000 payment of money owed by the Government to the railroads; $500,000,000 for pensions to Civil War and other soldiers, for vocational education and compensation for soldiers of the late war, more than $2,000,000,000 of the $3,800,000,000 estimated expenses are accounted for.

Secretary Mellon in his estimate for ordinary expenditures for the fiscal year 1922 has estimated $4,014,000,000. His estimate for the Navy Department was $545,000,000, but the naval bill, when it is finally passed, will probably carry an appropriation of $414,000,000. There will also be savings effected in some other of the estimated expenditures. The total estimate of the Secretary is $4,565,000,000, but this estimate includes a reduction in the public debt amounting to more than $551,000,000. A reduction of public debt has no place in our ordinary expenditures and can not be charged to governmental operating expenses.

The estimate of the Secretary of receipts for the fiscal year 1922 amounts to $4,547,643,000, all based upon the present system of taxation. If we eliminate the excess-profits tax and the so-called nuisance tax, this amount will be reduced to approximately $4,047,000,000.

The increased tariff duties proposed will result in an estimated increased revenue of $300,000,000, so that there will be available, with the elimination of the excess-profits tax and the so-called nuisance tax, approximately $500,000,000 for the reduction of our public debt during the next fiscal year, or if we provide for a sinking fund of $250,000,000 there will be available $250,000,000 for further reduction in taxes.

The Sixty-sixth Congress, the one preceding this one, has been able to give a good account of its stewardship. It has effected economies, effected a reduction in the public debt, and has cut down estimates made by the departments amounting to $1,000,000,000.

The Sixty-fifth Congress, in the lower House, passed appropriation bills, many of which failed to pass the Senate and which the Sixty-sixth Congress found it necessary to enact into law. These appropriations were cut down approximately $800,000,000, and $800,000,000 saved to the taxpayers of the United States. So that the criticism which is continually appearing of congressional legislation and appropriations is not well founded, but too often appears as a result of some ulterior motive which has for its desire the accomplishment of legislation affecting some particular private interest.

The bill under consideration can not be objected to on account of the Government not being able to assume financial obligations to the Federal farm loan bank. It is a governmental institution created by the Government, and it is the duty of the Government to see that it is able to properly function. When the amount of $50,000,000 was first thought of as being the necessary amount to enable these banks to meet their pressing obligations, the last issue of $40,000,000 Federal farm loan bonds had not been all sold, since which time these have all found a market with the exception of about $137,000, so that now there is not the occasion or the necessity to appropriate as much money to enable these banks to function as there was when the idea first occurred to Senator CURTIS, of Kansas, to introduce his bill for $50,000,000.

The assets of the Federal farm loan banks for May 31, 1921, amounted to $402,000,000, $350,000,000 of which has been loaned to farmers.

The present bill proposes to deposit with the Federal farm loan banks the difference between its capital stock and $50,000,000, which, together with the $6,000,000 of Government loan they already have and $25,000,000 to be received, will amount to $31,000,000. When the capital stock of the banks reach $50,000,000 the Government will cease to feel obligated to deposit additional funds. But at that time it will be possible for the Federal farm loan bank to have loaned to farmers approximately $1,000,000,000, due to the fact that they are privileged to issue bonds to the extent of twenty times their capital stock.

These bonds, bearing 5 per cent interest, nontaxable, should, if the provision of the law is carried out in making loans, be the best security almost in the land. Loans are made to farmers not to exceed 50 per cent of the value of the land and 20 per cent of the value of improvements. Provisions are made that estimates of value shall be conservatively made. Money has been commanding a high rate of interest, but this, like other commodities, is now demanding a less price.

Call money in New York is now 5 per cent. The Federal reserve bank of New York has reduced its discount rate to 6 per cent. Bank securities in New York are selling on a basis of 6.2 per cent income to purchasers, so that a nontaxable Federal reserve land bank bond bearing 5 per cent interest will soon be in demand, and there is no reason why the Federal farm loan banks will not be able to sell their issue when offered at determined intervals. There is now no real occasion for the Government to deposit in Federal farm loan banks the amount of money in excess of $25,000,000. It has been mentioned that the Government deposits in national banks receive 2½ per cent interest, whereas in the Federal farm loan banks the Government will receive 5½ per cent interest, but deposits in Federal farm loan banks remain permanent until such time as provisions will enable the banks to permit the Government to withdraw its deposit, whereas in banks in which the Government money is deposited money so deposited is liable to be checked out at any time. Sometimes the Government has on deposit in banks three quarters of a billion dollars and other times but little over $100,000,000.

One is practically a time deposit and the other a checking deposit.

I am glad of the opportunity to vote for the bill under consideration. It will assist an industry, the most laudable of any that exists.

We now have too few farmers and too many middlemen living in the city making their living off the product of the farmer and of the workers in factories. Many of these people are living on the efforts of their wits and their ability to sell to consumers by pyramiding the cost of commodities to the farmer and the laborers in manufactories effecting the high cost of living beyond the warrants of legitimate profit.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very glad to have had the privilege of assisting in presenting this legislation to the House. If there ever was a time when the agricultural interests of the country needed assistance in the financing of their problems that time is now. This bill will enable the Federal farm loan system to function. At the present time they need capital equal to or a little more than the amount of the bond issue they desire to float to enable them to secure the farm mortgages to place behind their bonds. They have a capital of about $25,000,000. So if they float a $50,000,000 bond issue they will need about $25,000,000, or perhaps $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 more, to use as a "turnover fund" in floating their bond issue.

This system has been of benefit to agriculture and is now needed more than ever for the reason that the money that has heretofore been available for investment in farm mortgages by the great insurance companies, private investors, and States is now being diverted by higher rates of interest into the good securities that are so easy now to obtain, and the farmers are being asked to liquidate and pay their mortgages when they become due. They therefore need the assistance of the Federal farm loan system more than ever before, and the Federal Farm Loan Board came to Congress asking assistance to enable them to have a needed "turnover fund," so as to sell their bonds. Senator CURTIS, of my State, introduced this bill in the Senate and the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. A. P. NELSON, introduced it in this House. The Senate bill passed first and came to our committee, where, after considerable "warfare," we finally unanimously reported out this amendment.

Now, there has been some criticism from the Democratic side and a little attempt to play politics on the floor of the House; but I want to congratulate the Democrats upon the committee, as the representatives of agricultural districts, on the fact that they were very fair and of much assistance in the consideration and perfection of this bill in the committee. They now criticize the fact that after it was first reported out of committee it was returned for this amendment, and, I think, improvement, and they have tried to show that it was a matter of politics.

But I want to say to the Members of this House that this bill without amendment was first ordered reported out of the committee over the objection of some of its members, who perhaps did not understand the agricultural situation as some of us do who represent agricultural districts. After it was ordered to be reported out, suggestions were offered which it was thought would make it possible for us to become unanimous as a committee in support of the bill. We therefore took it back into the committee, called down the Federal Farm Loan Board, and did succeed in agreeing to this amendment, and it was reported out by the unanimous vote of the committee.

Now, what is the difference between the original bill as it came from the Senate and this committee amendment? They both accomplish exactly the same purpose. The Senate bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, deposit with the farm loan banks up to $50,000,000 for the purpose of facilitating the issuance of these bonds. It does not say he must deposit $50,000,000. Two members of the Federal Farm Loan Board themselves stated to us that they did not expect to ask the Treasury to deposit more than they would need, and if their bond issue did not exceed $50,000,000 they would not need or ask for more than $25,000,000. The committee amendment provides that the Treasury shall deposit with the Federal Farm Loan Board the difference between their capital stock, which is $25,000,000, and $50,000,000, which will give them the $25,000,000 they will need to float a $50,000,000 bond issue, which is all they expect to attempt to float in a single issue.

That being the case, this committee amendment provides all the money that the Federal Farm Loan Board need, and they came before our committee and said so. They do need this difference between their capital and $50,000,000, which they will get by this amendment, and I hope no Member of this House will be led away by the statement that we are detracting from the benefits to be received by agriculture in this bill if we adopt the amendment that the committee has suggested.

There is one other feature in the amendment that I think is a good one. After the bill was first reported we were also advised that amendments would be offered limiting to three years this authority of the Treasury to make such deposits upon the theory that by the time the three years had expired the capital of the Federal farm loan bank would have reached $50,000,000 and would make this deposit no longer necessary. This bill provides that until the capital of this Federal Farm Loan Board shall have reached $50,000,000 this action by the Treasury shall be performed. It is a good amendment to a good bill and will enable the Federal farm loan system to function and give relief to agricultural interests. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman from Arkansas use some of his time?

Mr. WINGO. There will be but one more speech on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas has 29 minutes remaining.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and four Members present, a quorum.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR].

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, I am against this proposition, because I am against the granting of special favors to special interests. I do not believe that all of the farmers of the country should be taxed for the benefit of a few. I do not believe that all the people of the country should be taxed for the benefit of a special number or a special class. I do not believe that any more tax-exempt securities should be issued, placing upon the backs of the poor people of this country a tax and at the same time relieving the rich from it.

In this period of somewhat loose thinking far too many people delude themselves with the notion that tax exemption means that in some mysterious way the tax will not be paid. They forget that bills must be paid by some one and that pay day comes as regularly as the sun rises, and any form of tax exemption at all simply means that the burden of taxation is removed from one class to another; in other words, some one must work that another may shirk.

Let us briefly examine the Federal farm loan system as it is now subsidized.

The expenses of administration are paid by the Federal Treasury. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the appropriation was $303,000.

The capital of the land banks when organized was furnished for the most part out of the Federal Treasury, and no charge for interest or otherwise is made for its use, nor can dividends be paid by the system to the Government. On the outstanding Government capital now thus employed the annual loss in interest to the Federal Treasury, at 6 per cent on $6,832,680, is $409,960.80.

The Federal Treasury has purchased and is carrying $136,885,000 of Federal farm loan bonds yielding 4½ per cent and $43,350,000 yielding 5 per cent. The Federal Treasury is financing itself at an interest charge of 6 per cent. The annual loss to the Federal Treasury on the bonds thus carried is therefore $2,506,775. This makes a net total loss for the current year of $3,219,735.80.

The total volume of Federal farm loan bonds outstanding in the hands of the people on January 1, 1921, was $149,173,000. They are totally exempt from the Federal income tax, as well as from all State and local taxes.

The significant fact about these bonds is that they are held mostly by wealthy investors who buy them for the purpose of escaping income taxes. They are not attractive to small investors, but to investors having incomes of $100,000 or over, the tax-exemption feature makes them a good investment and the minimum loss to the Federal Treasury in taxes approximates $2,300,000 per year.

The burden placed upon the people of the United States by giving this special privilege to a few is over $5,000,000 per year.

These figures may not accord exactly with the last statement of the board, but they are approximately correct.

This is the money loss, the transfer of the burden of taxation from the backs of a few to those of their fellow citizens; it is the price that the poor who toil in the workshops of the cities, the diggers of the ditches, the miners in the mines, the owner of the humble home, the man of small income, must pay to the end that governmental aid may be given to a few and that the man of large income may escape contributing from his large income to the maintenance of the Government.

I have no complaint against the farmer. I appreciate the burdens that he bears and the insufficient return that he in general receives for the risks that he takes, and the small reward that he enjoys for the hours that he labors. I know the troubles and difficulties that he encounters. I have a farm myself, and my sympathy goes out to the farmer, but I am against the principle of taxing the farmers of my district for this purpose, of having them contribute to the cost of the maintenance of farms in other sections of the country or his neighbor farmer.

But I am against this bill upon a broader ground than that, and that is that it is another step toward socialism and paternalism—that insidious poison that is gradually invading the veins of our Republic.

The history of the ages is replete with the decay that always attended dependence upon government. America is great and powerful and strong to-day, not on account of her wonderful resources and natural wealth, primarily, but because of the sturdy race of men and women that overcame the obstacles of the wilderness and made a great Nation and developed the resources that we have.

A few years ago it was an almost abhorrent thought that the Government should take any part in the individual affairs of its citizens, but to-day we are listening to the insidious whispers of the socialist, the communist, the bolshevist, or whatever name you wish to call him by, who is trying to delude the people into the vain and foolish belief that the State should forever hold out the helping hand; that this class or some other class needs Government assistance; and that unless Uncle Sam comes to the rescue ruin is assured.

The final result of a few more laws like this present one that we are considering to-day is not pleasant to contemplate for a thoughtful man who loves his country and her people. Paternalism means pauperizing the people and getting them to depend on something other than their own work and effort. Nothing can be more appalling than this feeling of dependence upon the Government generally developed, and unless the tide is soon stemmed the menace of socialistic paternalism will overwhelm the citizenry of our country and a race of pioneers will degenerate into a Nation of parasites.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 12 minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, in concluding this debate there is little occasion to attempt more than a summary of the situation. The Committee on Banking and Currency, by unanimous vote, barring only the gentleman who has just taken his seat, who opposes it on a side issue, advises the House to substitute the draft before you for the Senate bill. My good friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] joins, I think, the other members of the committee in advising the House to adopt this substitute, although he may advocate amendment. He is an excellent parliamentarian, one of the best in the House, and he perfectly understands that I should transgress the rules of parliamentary conduct by discussing what went on in the committee. And although he himself came dangerously near disclosing what occurred in the committee, I am confident that when he comes to the extension of his remarks his uniform good faith will not lead him to take advantage of the situation by violating the rule with which he is so familiar.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LUCE. This is a solo. I will, if necessary, engage in a duet with the gentleman under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LUCE. And I will make it a trio, even, under the five-minute rule, but not at present. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Is the gentleman objecting to his course in the committee being revealed?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I should be quite willing to reveal my course in the committee were it not for the point of order that ought to be raised against such a course.

The committee was confronted by a measure containing two elements, and unless these are discriminated there can be no fair decision in the vote about to take place. The first proposition was advanced by reason of the failure of our friends on the Democratic side of the House when they framed the farm loan act to foresee the amount of working capital needed. When the Republicans came into power it became necessary to correct the error committed by our Democratic friends. We have faced the issue squarely and provided enough capital for the system.

At first it was suggested that there ought to be $50,000,000 of working capital, but upon analysis it was proved to the satisfaction of everybody, except perchance the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], that it was not needed by the amount of $19,000,000. And so, after long conferences, we finally reached the conclusion to advise the House to extend the help of the Government to this extent. In all these deliberations the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. A. P. NELSON] took an active part, for which he deserves recognition and credit. He has been the true friend of the agricultural interests in this matter, and has helped wisely in bringing about a happy solution of a difficult problem. He is to be thanked and congratulated for what he has thus achieved to the benefit of the farm loan system.

I need not spend further time upon the question as to whether this is a sound and safe provision of working capital, for over against the argument so eloquently put forth by the temporary exigencies. There lies the great mistake of any the view of the men who know something about it [laughter], the men who operate the system, the Farm Loan Board itself, because the members of the Farm Loan Board say that this is enough. This is all, they say, that is necessary for the proper working of the system.

The system is an admirable system. I want to say just one word in recognition of its merit. I trust its prosperity may continue. With existing law it already has amassed a capitalization of $350,000,000, put out in loans. I shall be very glad to help in the perfecting of this system and correcting any other errors in its structure for which my friends on the other side may be responsible. To you who are contributing to the development of this system I would point out at least the opportunity to strengthen it by amalgamating with it features of the cooperative banking system, which might very well be studied for this purpose.

The farm loan system was devised not for the purpose of loaning money to farmers for running expenses or to meet temporary exigencies. There lies the great mistake of my friends on the other side. I regret very much to have to call to the attention of the House the fact that the number of tenant farmers in this country is still increasing. By the figures that came to us a few days ago it appears that of the 6,449,242 farmers in this country 2,455,879 are tenants. Two-fifths of the farmers of this country hire their farms, and the proportion is somewhat larger now than it was 10 years ago.

God speed the farm loan system if it meets that evil. Such it is doing. Already it has helped farmers to the extent of $350,000,000. If it will function as it should, properly and naturally, with this addition of capital placed at its disposal by the Government, well and good. My Democratic friends here, however, desire us to go further. They emphasize the view that we ought to take this system and engraft upon it another system, that we ought to debauch it, that we ought to pervert it to unholy ends.

I want to put in the RECORD what the men who are running this system think of such a proposal—not only the opinion of Judge Lobdell, whose political views are of one kind, but also the opinion of Mr. Lever, whose politics are of another kind. There ought not to be any politics in the consideration of this question, and there are none in the Farm Loan Board. Here is what the Farm Loan Board says, through its chairman, Judge Lobdell. Mark it, my friends, you who are yet to write out the 13 speeches that are not in this morning's RECORD. Incorporate, if you please, this statement of the chairman:

> The Farm Loan Board does not adopt the theory that the farm loan act was intended to be or is an institution for conveying public money to individual borrowers or loaning public money, or that the public funds were intended to be loaned.

And further:

> The Federal farm loan system was not intended to be and is not an emergency measure, and it ought not to be expected to be geared up to emergency operations.

In view of the amendments that are about to be proposed, evidently an attempt will be made to gear the system up to emergency operations, to debauch it by perverting it to dangerous ends—dangerous to the system and dangerous to the farmers. You will be asked through this system to lend public money to men in temporary need.

Let me suggest also that you incorporate in the 13 speeches yet to be printed the statement that if you should give this system the $19,000,000 extra you say you wish to give, you would, on the basis of the average loans from the start of the system, furnish aid to 1 farmer in 954. Loans are now averaging to be somewhat larger than at first, so it is fair to say you would furnish aid to one farmer in a thousand. Your eloquent speeches, those already delivered and the 13 yet to be written, will serve to show that you have heroically, on one of the hottest days in the year, stood up on this floor and demanded that you might put your hands into the Public Treasury in order to help out one farmer in a thousand! [Applause.]

Furthermore, this farm loan system contemplates that the money shall be repaid by partial payments extending over 33 years. Is it wise that men should under such a system mortgage their farms for passing needs? Thirty-three years to replace the money borrowed to buy a plow or a tractor or some other instrument! Thirty-three years to return the cash wanted for carrying crops over a few months longer! Thirty-three years to repay a loan that ought in its nature to be for something enduring and permanent! Can you not see that to resort to such a system for meeting temporary emergencies, lasting only a few months, would be detrimental and perilous to the system itself? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> That section 32 of the Federal farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916, as amended, is hereby amended by adding after the first paragraph a new paragraph to read as follows:
> "Until such time as the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks shall be $50,000,000, or more, the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, make deposits in addition to those authorized by the preceding paragraph, to be secured, redeemed, and paid in the same manner as provided in such paragraph, except that any additional deposit made hereunder shall be called by the Secretary of the Treasury and redeemed by the bank or banks holding the same within 15 days after the conclusion of each general offering of farm loan bonds by such bank or banks. The aggregate of such additional deposits outstanding at any time shall not exceed the difference between the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks on the last day of the preceding month and the sum of $50,000,000. The certificates of indebtedness issued to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Federal land bank for such additional deposits shall bear a rate of interest not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the last bond issue of the land bank receiving such deposits."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the figures "$50,000,000" and insert "$75,000,000" in the two places where the figures occur.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment by Mr. WINGO: Page 2, line 15, strike out "$50,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$75,000,000"; page 3, line 3, strike out "$50,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$75,000,000."

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment, and do so as a friend of the Federal farm loan system. I want to agree with the gentlemen who have preceded me in their statement of the high esteem in which the Federal Farm Loan Board is entitled to be held by the American Congress. There has been nothing in their conduct that would warrant this Congress in treating the Federal farm loan bank as a football every time a little proposition comes up here pertaining to it.

In the act of 1920, as has been said here, we authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to buy certain Federal farm loan bonds to liquidate some obligations that the Federal farm loan banks were under that they could not take care of by reason of the fact that they were tied up in the courts. Congress has been criticized yesterday and to-day, because at that time it did not appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury to operate the Federal farm loan banks during the depression and during the time they were tied up in the courts. As a true friend of the system, who has always argued that it could be maintained without Government subsidy, I disagree with that argument, and I glory in the nerve and the manhood and the integrity of Frank Lever and Charlie Lobdell when they said they did not want to operate in that way. I want to say to you that men like the distinguished gentleman from Texas, who spoke here yesterday, deserve some credit when, speaking of this proposed amendment, he said they were putting $25,000,000 in the Federal farm loan banks that they did not want to use, because they are not going to sell but $40,000,000 of bonds at a time. So it is apparent that without the amendment it will furnish them capital enough. Why put $25,000,000 more into the land bank system for them to pay interest on? I say the truth of the statement is that the friends of the system who want to see it perpetuated ought not to support the amendment. I do not charge the gentleman from Arkansas with being an enemy to the system; he is a friend of the farm loan bank system, but there is something he loves better. His chief pastime is politics, and he plays it 24 hours a day. He is playing it to-day at the expense of the great Federal farm loan bank, which is the best friend the farmer ever had. Read his speech and compare it with the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. This bill without the amendment gives the banks sufficient money to take care of the issue of bonds from one issue to another, and why do you want to put $25,000,000 more in there for them to pay interest on? Suppose the worst should come, suppose that the Federal land banks should get into some emergency so that at a certain time they would have to have more money, they could come to Congress and apply for it. Congress would give it to them, because it knows that they are fair, that they do not ask for $25,000,000 when they do not need it. Gentlemen, I hope that this amendment will not pass and that the friends of this great system will not permit it to be made a football of. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I am in hearty sympathy with the purpose that this bill seeks to bring about, but I would like to call the attention of the Committee on Agriculture to several amendments that I think should be made in order to strengthen the measure. On page 1, line 8, after the word "and," I would add "cooperative or other," so that it would read "cooperative or other associations."

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is already in the bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. The word "cooperative" is not in the bill.

Mr. JACOWAY. I will say to the gentleman that it says, on page 1:

> The term "person" includes individuals, partnerships, corporations, and associations.

If that is correct, will the gentleman contend that his amendment should still go in?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will say to my friend from Arkansas that if the words "cooperative or other" were added after the word "and" in line 8 there would be absolutely no doubt as to the meaning of the section.

Mr. JACOWAY. The question I will put to the gentleman now is, If he thinks that under the terms as defined there can be absolutely any question?

Mr. KNUTSON. You are giving a leeway in the manner of interpreting the word "association." Why leave it open? It is not going to cost anything to add the words "cooperative or other associations."

Mr. JACOWAY. It may not be wrong to put the words there, but it would be surplusage.

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not think so. Another amendment that I would suggest to the Agricultural Committee is on page 25, line 14. Now, one of the purposes of this bill is to throw the searchlight of publicity on the operations of the packers. The bill now reads:

> Whenever the Secretary finds that the accounts, records, and memoranda of any such person do not fully and correctly disclose all transactions involved in his business, the Secretary may prescribe the manner and form.

I would change the word "may" to "shall," and thus make it mandatory. I will not say that this discretionary legislation does not amount to anything, but I believe legislation should be mandatory wherever possible.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is the gentleman afraid to trust to the good judgment of the Secretary?

Mr. KNUTSON. We have had three Secretaries of Agriculture since I have been in Congress, and one of them I would not trust any too far.

Mr. RAYBURN. And the Secretary is pretty well loaded with what they have delegated to him in this bill already, without any addition.

Mr. KNUTSON. On page 28, line 12, I would add after the numerals "1914":

> And in any case where the Federal Trade Commission is directed to investigate by the President or either branch of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to be the popular thing these days to rap and discredit the work of the Federal Trade Commission. Personally, I think that body has rendered good service in throwing the searchlight of publicity on the transactions of great industrial concerns. I agree with Secretary Hoover that publicity is the cure for many present-day evils, and I believe that we should have more publicity on the operations of the packing industry than we now have or is contemplated under this bill, and by adding the amendment suggested by me after the numerals "1914," the bill would be materially strengthened. This is a good bill and should pass. All farmer organizations from which I have heard are in favor of its passage; in fact, it is my information that representatives of the American Farm Bureau Association were present when it was being considered by the committee.

Gentlemen of the committee, something must be done to aid the farming interests of the country, and we should do everything in our power to promote their welfare. I have in mind two things that we should do that would materially help them. First, conclude peace with the Central Powers, so that they could buy of our surplus foodstuffs. Second, pass the Nelson bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase $50,000,000 worth of Federal farm loan bonds, so that the farm banks could take care of all applications for farm loans. I am glad that the former will be an accomplished fact within the next few weeks. Let us also make the latter one of the early measures to be placed on its final passage. When this has been done it will draw aside the curtain of darkness and reveal the dawning of a better day.

Conditions in the country to-day are most serious, and all lines of endeavor are handicapped and crippled. Every great war has been followed by a period of depression such as we now have, but never before has there been a disarrangement so universal and far-reaching. Everywhere is industrial chaos and wreck, unemployment and discontent. Perhaps none have been harder hit than the farmers. Their products have shrunk in value one-half, while the things they must buy are about as high as they were during the peak of the war. High freight rates are largely responsible for this condition. I feel that Congress should lose no time in repealing the clause in the Esch-Cummins Act which virtually amounts to a guaranty of a fixed return on railroad investments. It was that clause which prompted me to vote against that measure when it passed the House in November, 1919. We do not guarantee a fixed return to the farmer, business man, or manufacturer, and we should treat the railroads on the same basis as the others are being treated.

Members of Congress from large centers of population must get over the idea that legislation helpful to the agricultural interests is socialism. I would urge upon them the necessity for legislation that will relieve in part the heavy load being borne by the farmers of the country. Let the Committee on Banks and Banking bring out a measure that will provide them with short-term loans; also, let this Government place its mark of disapproval upon ambitious schemes to finance foreign countries while there is such great need for money at home. There never was a time when the phrase, "Charity begins at home," should mean so much as now. Get the American farmer, business man, and laborer back on their feet and all will be well.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] a minute ago spoke of the offering of this amendment as playing politics. He referred to the discussion as politics. The members of the Committee on Banking and Currency, according to my experience, are not accustomed to play politics with the finances of this country. If we are playing politics by asking you to put $50,000,000 instead of $25,000,000 into the farm loan system, the Senator from Kansas, the author of the bill, inaugurated the political era, because he thought it was the proper amount when he introduced the bill. They passed it through the Senate, and they are permeated with politics if the gentleman from Kansas is right.

The gentleman from Kansas made another statement in which he said that Congress was criticized yesterday because it did not appropriate money to run the Farm Loan Board during the suspension of operations when the Supreme Court was in a case of coma on the subject last year. I have not heard any such criticism, and I thought I heard the whole debate. In other words, the gentleman from Kansas talks through his hat, and sometimes, when he has not got his hat on, he talks through the hair of his head.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] made a suggestive remark a while ago. He said that this was taxation, if the amendment proposed here by the gentleman from Arkansas was adopted; that we would tax all the people to help one farmer out of a thousand. What do they propose to do? If that proposition is true, they propose to tax the people to help one farmer out of two thousand. Where is the difference in principle? The truth of the business is, and you want to get it into your heads, this does not tax anybody to help any farmer; it is an investment, under the direction of Congress, whereby the Treasury of the United States is absolutely protected, and it does not cost the taxpayer of this country one dollar. If you are going to make it one out of two thousand, why is it wrong to make it one out of one thousand? The gentleman from Massachusetts is not in favor of doing anything. It was only because he was confronted with the fact that once the bill passed by the Senate, introduced by the Senator from Kansas, got on the floor of the House, he and his conferees opposed to doing anything for the farmer would be run over as with a steam roller by the friends of the farmers in this House, and the bill would be passed with a fifty million provision in it. That is the only reason he became in favor of the $25,000,000 proposition.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. WINGO. Is it not true that when the bill providing for $50,000,000 was before the committee the Secretary of the Treasury and Judge Lobdell were before the committee, and they suggested that with the $50,000,000 it would be possible to do a $40,000,000 business between now and the next bond issue?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. There is where the limit of $40,000,000 came in.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; that is what was said, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] held this matter up for a week in order to file a minority report against it, which he got permission to do, and which he never did, because they succeeded in getting it back to the committee in order that he might become unanimous by cutting down to where it is practically worthless to the whole proposition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in view of what has been said here in respect to the action of the committee in the consideration of this bill, I think I should say this: When the bill came into our committee there were members of the committee who were not in favor of it. In doing what he thought was for the best interests of the farmer the sponsor of the bill insisted on early consideration, which was a very brief consideration, and an almost immediate vote. The committee did vote this bill out some days before action was taken. We attempted, with the cooperation of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. A. P. NELSON], who was to make the report, to get a reconsideration of the measure, which we did get. After we got it back into the committee we considered it in an intelligent manner and amended the previous action in such a way that it met with the approval of the entire committee. We called before the committee the farm loan commissioner and Mr. Lever, a member of the board. We discussed this matter in detail with them and worked out this solution. It meets with the entire satisfaction of the Federal Farm Loan Board, because it permits the Federal farm loan system to function. Fifty million dollars of capital is sufficient for them to accumulate the mortgages so that they may sell bonds in lots to $50,000,000. That is all they claim they want to do. If we accept this amendment which is proposed, it means that we are giving the system more money than the men who are running it say they need. It means that we are putting into the Treasury of this great system additional funds for the purpose of purchasing mortgages in excess of their ability to dispose of them, and it means also, if we do this, under the provisions of this act, that the farm loan system must be burdened with paying a greater annual interest charge than otherwise, which is something we do not want to have them do.

I think I have covered this matter, and I think the matter has been pretty thoroughly discussed. I suggest that we vote on the amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas and have five minutes upon it.

Mr. WINGO. I suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania ask unanimous consent that debate close at a certain time.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I want to have five minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I have five minutes? Mr. MADDEN, the permanent chairman of the committee, said that he would recognize me on this amendment. I could not get any time in general debate. Make it 15 minutes and I shall not object.

Mr. McFADDEN. I accept the gentleman's suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman modifies his request to have the time limit fixed at 15 minutes. Does the gentleman state who is to have the time?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes. Five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG], and five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend the substitute of the gentleman from Arkansas by striking out the figures "$75,000,000," where they appear in two places, and inserting "$100,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRISP offers an amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. WINGO by striking out "$75,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$100,000,000."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am not going to talk politics and I do not think you have ever heard me on this floor talk partisan politics. The World War has upset all economic conditions in this country. Every line of business is suffering; but no class of citizens throughout the whole United States are in the financial distress of the farmers of the land. They can not realize anything like the cost of production of their products, and unless they can get some financial relief they will go into bankruptcy. I will say to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] that unless you aid the farmers financially there will be more tenant farmers than there were according to the last Federal census.

My amendment and this bill make no charge upon the taxpayers of the country. It is a sane, economic proposition, and it in no way destroys the rural credits system. It simply authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit a large sum of money in these banks, to be loaned under the terms of the Federal land act; and what are those terms? Fifty per cent of the value of the land, exclusive of the improvements thereon, on a first real estate mortgage. Is there any better security? The Government deposits money in national banks and gets only 2 and 2½ per cent interest, while if the Government will deposit $100,000,000 in the 12 Government Federal land banks it will receive over 5 per cent interest on the deposit and it will afford a working capital to enable the Federal farm loan system to function as it was intended to do when Congress passed it.

Friends on the Republican side say the Democrats made a mistake when they passed this farm-loan act in not providing sufficient capital for the banks. That may be true. Has anyone ever known of a great economic piece of legislation being enacted into law without some defect in it? Though there were defects, and though they still remain, it is with pride that I recall the fact that the Democratic Party was the one that fathered and passed the law, and now we are asking you to help us correct its defects by providing larger credits for the system.

What is the harm in adopting my suggestion, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit $100,000,000 in the bank? If he does not think it is necessary, he will not have to do it; and if it is necessary, if we pass this law, I believe he will do it. That would enable the banks to grant loans to the farmers of the country on their land, not for a temporary purpose to hold their crops, and so forth, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] says, but to save themselves from bankruptcy. It will enable them to pay off mortgages now on their land where the creditor is threatening to foreclose, and this financial relief will prevent many thousands of farmers from becoming tenant farmers.

Mr. Chairman, in my section it is impossible for the farmers to obtain loans from private sources to pay off pressing indebtedness on their farms or to secure the necessary money to buy fertilizer and machinery essential for the carrying on of their business, for practically all the local capital was loaned out to make last year's crops, and the banks and individuals have exhausted their credit. The only possible way, in my judgment, that relief can be extended the farmers is by the Government, through the Federal farm loan system. Realizing the gravity of the situation, on June 8 last I introduced a bill, H. R. 6960, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to loan to the Federal Farm Loan Board $200,000,000, to be loaned out under the terms of the Federal farm loan act. I believe that amount is needed by the farming interests, but seeing the temper of this House I have no hope of such an amount passing, and therefore I introduced my substitute for one hundred millions.

I trust my amendment will be adopted, but if not, I shall vote for the bill, because it is a step in the right direction and it at least doubles the capital of the farm land banks, and as it is to be a revolving fund, it will enable many loans to be made that could not be made without the additional capital.

I hope, gentlemen of the committee, as most of you have the interest of the farmer at heart, that you will vote for my substitute. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 6652. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River, in Muskogee County, Okla.; and

H. R. 6653. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at a point near Webbers Falls, in Muskogee County, Okla.

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purposes does the gentleman from Texas rise? The time has been limited and allotted. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEAL] is recognized.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am a farmer, perhaps one of the very few Members of this body engaged exclusively in that occupation. I listened through the entire day yesterday at the many expressions of sympathy by the lawyers of this body for the farmer. They told us about the distress of the farmer and the sympathy they have and the relief they proposed to give him through the medium of this bill. I attended a meeting, some weeks ago in the House Office Building, of farmers. There were present a number of Senators and Representatives of this House. They all with one accord announced with loud acclaim their desire to assist the farmer, and without hesitation or mental reservation promised to do anything that the farmer wanted. I was delighted to hear those gentlemen promise so much for those of us who are suffering. Now, this bill, as I understand, is to provide that $25,000,000 shall be, or may be, deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury with the Farm Loan Board, the idea being, as I gather it, that this money may be loaned to the farmers and thereby bring relief to them in their distress. My understanding is that there are about 7,000,000 farmers in this country. If we divide those $25,000,000 among the six or seven million farmers, we will each receive about $4, and I am anxious to see this bill pass in order that I may receive my $4. [Laughter.] I may need it before I get away from Washington to take care of my board bill.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia would pave the way for each farmer to borrow an additional $12, and I shall support his amendment. I have no idea that it will be adopted. The majority of this body, I suspect, would feel that it would bankrupt the Treasury and encourage an era of extravagance and idleness among the farmers that would jeopardize the food supply of our country. Therefore we will in all probability have to content ourselves with loans of $4, which will be useful in making up our tax money. Since there are so many here who are ready and willing to assist us farmers, may I not express the hope that we turn our attention to the tax levy, where we may be of real assistance not only to the farmer but to all classes of our citizens.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] stated upon this floor a few days since that appropriations during the coming fiscal year would be approximately $3,500,000,000, with possible payments, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, of $4,014,000,000.

In answering the charge that the Republicans have been spending at the rate of $6,000,000,000 per year, he, Mr. MADDEN, stated that—

> Everyone knows that expenditures have nothing to do with the state of appropriations. It can well be that appropriations would not exceed $3,000,000,000 in a given year, and yet the expenditures might be $6,000,000,000.

This leaves a hazy idea as to whether $4,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000 is to be expended during the coming fiscal year. If it be $4,000,000,000, then each man, woman, and child in the United States of America would be taxed in the amount of approximately $40 for the support of the Federal Government. Should the expenditure, however, be $6,000,000,000, even though the appropriations do not exceed $4,000,000,000, the money must come from some source, either as a result of taxation or the expenditure of capital invested; and therefore the burden upon each man, woman, and child for the expenditure of the Government would be $60. Assuming that there is one bread earner out of five, we may conclude that one out of every five of our citizens will bear the burden of taxation, and therefore the farmers will be taxed during the coming year in the sum of $200, perhaps $300, each. Taking into consideration the cost of operating our State governments, it would perhaps be well within bounds to say that the average per capita cost would be $8, or $40 for the bread earner. The average cost of operating the county governments in the various States of the Union is unknown to me, but taking those with which I am acquainted as an average, we will find that the per capita cost will reach the sum of approximately $20, or a tax upon the bread earner of $100. The total of these taxes will amount to $440. Now, I submit that here is an opportunity for this Congress to extend real help to the farmer. We should reduce our expenditures and incidentally taxation. It is exceedingly difficult for the farmer to raise the means with which to pay this enormous sum for taxes, and the $4, or even $16, which he might be able to borrow as a result of the legislation under consideration would go but a little way toward meeting this enormous tax. If I might be permitted to speak in any sense for the farmer, I would request those gentlemen who are eager to assist them to reduce the present high rate of taxation.

Within a short time a tariff bill will be presented to this body for consideration. Then will develop the real opportunity to assist the farmer. I am opposed to, and I believe that our farmers would oppose, import duties that would stifle competition, but we feel that commodities coming into competition with their products should carry duties comparable to those which must of necessity be purchased by them.

I believe that were our tax bill reduced to $3,000,000,000 annually, and reasonable uniform duties, which would develop a maximum revenue, imposed, we would aid the farmer far more than by the passage of this bill, from which so few will be benefited. I do not mean to minimize, however, the benefits which will result to the farmer by the passage of the bill under consideration. My hope is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia will be adopted.

Mr. ALMON and Mr. STRONG of Kansas rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I thought five minutes was allotted to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman later.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, the intention of Congress in establishing a system of farm loan banks in 1916 was to provide the farmers with a banking system having the aid and support of the Federal Government. The condition and business of the farmer made a separate banking system necessary.

The farmer needs long-term loans. The ordinary commercial banks made short-time loans and could not supply his demands. One purpose of the farm loan banks was to enable the farmers who are tenants to acquire a farm of their own on a long-term installment plan at a low rate of interest, so as to enable them to pay for the land for less than they would pay in rents.

These banks have not had a fair chance to demonstrate their usefulness. They were unable to float their bonds during the war while the Government was selling bonds to raise money with which to prosecute the war. The litigation contesting the constitutionality of the act creating these banks also interfered very materially with the business of the banks. They have been the means of reducing the rate of interest and securing long-term loans.

There is a greater need to-day for the banks than ever before on account of the financial distress of the farmers. The original farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, upon the request of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to deposit for temporary use of any Federal land bank, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed $6,000,000 at any one time, and required the Federal land bank in which such deposit is made to issue to the Secretary a certificate of indebtedness for the deposit to be secured by farm loan bonds or other collateral satisfactory to the Secretary, the rate of interest on such certificate not to exceed the current rate charged for other Government deposits. The present capital of all 12 of the Federal farm loan banks is about $25,000,000.

The effect of this bill, as reported to the House by the Committee on Banking and Currency, is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make additional deposits to the amount of $25,000,000 so as to give them a working capital of $50,000,000. The bill, as it passed the Senate, authorized an additional deposit of $50,000,000. The amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] places it back like it passed the House. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] makes it $75,000,000 additional. I shall vote for the Crisp amendment and if it fails I shall vote for the Wingo amendment. I presume that both of these amendments will be voted down as the Republican majority has decided on the bill as reported by the committee. We will have to take what we can get and then ask for more later if necessary.

Approved applications for loans amounting to $140,000,000 show that the $25,000,000 is entirely inadequate, but it will help some. From the organization of these banks to May 31, 1921, 132,525 loans have been made, amounting to $373,258,390. In Alabama 4,531 loans, amounting to $8,567,720, have been made.

This measure will bring some relief to agriculture which is in worse condition than ever before in this country. The processes of deflation hit the farmer first. The agricultural products were the first to drop to prewar prices.

The commercial banks have loaned to their limit in attempting to tide the farmers over this period of great and unprecedented distress, and, of course, are vitally interested in the farmers being granted loans by the Federal farm loan banks in order to meet these obligations. So it is all important that this bill become a law at once. Long-time credits must be made available to the farmers. The country banks must be helped to carry the farmers until their crops can be raised and marketed to pay debts caused by the terrible slumping in the value of farm products, which have been ruinous.

In a few months' time the price of cotton dropped from 35 cents to 12 cents, less than one-half of the cost of production; corn from $2 to 50 cents per bushel; hogs from 18 cents per pound to 6 cents per pound; and all other farm products in proportion, while there was no reduction in farming implements, fertilizer, and many other things the farmers were forced to buy.

The agricultural interests are very properly appealing to us for some assistance in this crucial time.

The total loans of all national banks in the United States amounts to $14,000,000,000, and less than $2,000,000,000 of that is loaned to the farmers. Twenty-one per cent to manufacturing enterprises and 36 per cent to merchandising business, while the farmer furnishes more primary deposits than merchandising and manufacturing concerns combined.

Based on the rules of credit, agriculture should be entitled to 57 per cent of the $14,000,000,000, or $7,000,000,000, instead of $2,000,000,000 now loaned to the farmers by national banks.

I supported and voted for the bill, the purpose of which is to stop gambling in the products of the farms. Also the bill to reorganize the War Finance Corporation to aid in securing foreign markets for the surplus products of the farms. I voted a few days ago for the Porter peace resolution because I believe it will be the means of enabling Germany to buy more of our cotton, and in that way increase the price of cotton. I will continue to support measures which I believe will be to the interest of our country, especially measures to relieve the farmers and help them out of their trouble, even if they are proposed by the Republican administration. I believe we should support the administration where it is right and to the interest of our people.

The Federal farm loan banking system was established during the Democratic administration. Experience has shown that this amendment is necessary. Agriculture is our greatest basic industry and is the foundation for all other industries. Business in manufacturing and industrial districts will not succeed unless agriculture is successful. The business of our country is connected up in such a way that business becomes paralyzed when agriculture is not prosperous and successful. So I appeal to every Member of this House to support this measure, which is intended for the benefit of the farmers, who are in such dire need of assistance at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think it will not be disputed that I am one of the members of the Banking and Currency Committee that has been fighting to favorably report and bring this bill before this House ever since it was referred to our committee. I have been criticized and jobbed for the efforts I have made in behalf of this legislation, and I think no one now doubts that if I thought that the Federal Farm Loan Board needed $50,000,000, or $75,000,000, or $100,000,000 in order to function and serve agricultural interests that I would vote for it and support it. But, my friends, we are trying to run this Government so as not to bankrupt the people. If we do it in a businesslike way we will appropriate only the money that is necessary and refrain from appropriating more money than is needed for any purpose. Now, what are the facts? They are: The Federal Farm Loan Board needs a working capital, not as the gentleman from Virginia said to lend to the farmers to be divided out at $4 a head, but for the purpose of using it as a turnover fund to float hundreds of millions of dollars of bonds. Now, how much do they need? Do they need $50,000,000? They say they do not. I went to two members of the Federal Farm Loan Board, a Democrat and a Republican, when this amendment was suggested, and I said, "If your board needs $50,000,000 we will stand for $50,000,000." They said, "We do not need it; this amendment will give us the money that we do need." If this amendment will give them all the money they need, why make the amendment for $50,000,000? Why the amendment for $75,000,000? They are Democratic amendments to confuse the friends of this system. Our Democratic friends are now playing politics, and I want the members of this committee to vote both amendments down. The Senate bill was introduced by Senator CURTIS, of Kansas, and he told me that the committee amendment was satisfactory to him, as it was satisfactory to the Farm Loan Board; that he introduced the bill to make this farm loan system function, and as members of that board have told him that this amendment would enable them to do so and serve the farmers of the Nation, he would try and have it agreed to by the Senate.

Now, gentlemen, why appropriate money that we do not need simply to help the Democrats to play a little politics and embarrass somebody, and try to make the farmers believe that they are going to get something more by this amendment than they would get by the bill as amended that the committee has brought in here? I hope every friend of this system will get away from these seductive amendments and stand with the friends of this farm loan system for the amendment as reported out by our committee unanimously, for it is all the friends of the Federal farm loan system ask for; all that the Farm Loan Board ask; it is all the authors of the bill ask; it is all that is needed; it is all we ought to appropriate; and it is sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CRISP. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 98.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. STEVENSON. I rose to offer an amendment, but I see that the Chair has not announced the result.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment is rejected. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 115.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEVENSON offers to amend the committee amendment as follows: Page 2, beginning on line 20, after the word "hereunder," strike out all the balance of line 20 and all of lines 21 and 22, and down through the word "offering" in line 23, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "may be withdrawn by the Secretary of the Treasury at any time after 15 days after the conclusion of each general sale."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not think that my friend from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] meant to charge those of us who offer amendments here with not being in favor of this bill.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I did not.

Mr. STEVENSON. He called on them to vote down the amendment offered to embarrass the bill and the friends of the bill to stand up.

Here is a proposition that I think will improve this very much, and I want the House to understand it, and I want it to vote it down if it desires to do so. The bill as it reads, in lines 20 to 23, provides that within 15 days after a general offering of farm-loan bonds the Secretary of the Treasury shall call the loan which has been made. It makes it mandatory. Now, get that; whether the sale has been perfected or not or whether there is money on which to run, 15 days after the offering of the bonds and when the Secretary does not need the $25,000,000. I propose to make it read in this way:

That any additional deposits made hereunder may be withdrawn by the Secretary of the Treasury at any time after 15 days after the conclusion of each general sale.

Now, general sale and not general offering. You notice that he shall withdraw it 15 days after any general offering of bonds. Two things develop there. The offering may not result in a sale, and, therefore, they may not have the money, and, therefore, it would be no general sale, and then it should not be mandatory. It should be permissible, because the terms provide that he may make the deposit, but it says that he shall withdraw it. I want the calm judgment of this committee on whether it is not better to provide against contingencies by giving the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion and putting the condition of withdrawal on a general sale and not a general offering of the bonds.

Mr. BARBOUR. What is the meaning of the words "conclusion of each general offering"? Does it contemplate a sale?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. But it may not result in a sale.

Mr. BARBOUR. Then it is not concluded.

Mr. STEVENSON. But the offering might be made and it might be turned down. That is the proposition I want to put up to this committee, and I do it because I think it will be of exceedingly great benefit to the Treasury and will justify some of the other things that are done here. Now, my distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] called on all to vote down these amendments and the friends of the bill to stand up against them. I have offered an amendment. I have been for the bill from the start, and I want to assure him that there is not a Democrat on the committee that is opposed to the bill, and the gentleman would not have gotten it out of the committee if he had not had the solid support of the Democrats. Therefore, if he had never got it out he never would have gotten this compromise at all, and, therefore, I think we are entitled to be considered to have some friendship for the bill. A gentleman said a while ago that we had been listening to the lawyers. But I am a farmer, and have farmed rather extensively, and I know all the conditions that surround them, and I ask you to help us and not to tie our hands, so that this apparent help will not be nugatory after it has been granted.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the majority understand just what the amendment means. The gentleman from South Carolina proposes to change the word "shall" to the word "may," so that when this farm loan system has sold their bond issue it may be optional with the farm loan system whether they use the money on hand or return it to the Treasury.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman misconstrues it. It shall be optional with the Secretary of the Treasury whether he shall withdraw it or not. There is no option to the Federal Farm Loan Board. My amendment provides that the Secretary may withdraw it 15 days after a general sale. That is all there is to it, and the bill now provides it has got to be withdrawn 15 days after a general offering.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that that section of the bill has the approval of the farm loan commissioner. In fact, that section was drafted by him. We discussed that question in the committee as to whether or not it would be possible, within 15 days after disposing of the offering of the bonds, for him to return the money. He explained to us that it was possible, because these bonds were syndicated, and that the manager of the syndicate, as soon as the sale was made, turned over the money to the farm loan system. Therefore the money was in the treasury of that system. The matter of 15 days does not make any difference. They have the money on hand, and why should they keep it in their possession when they are compelled to pay an extra rate of interest upon it? It is largely an administrative matter, and those of us who want to protect the Public Treasury in assisting the system at this time feel that the Secretary of the Treasury should insist upon the Farm Loan Board returning that money to the Public Treasury when it is not needed. The farm loan system under its authority has the right again to call for this money whenever they need it to accumulate new mortgages to place back of new issues of bonds to be offered for sale to the investing public. Therefore I hope this amendment will not be agreed to and will be voted down. [Applause.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Is it not true that the chairman of the Farm Loan Board agrees to the language that the gentleman from South Carolina is trying to change by his amendment?

Mr. McFADDEN. It is; yes. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that at the end of five minutes the debate close on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that at the end of five minutes the debate on this amendment close. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, throughout this whole debate the gentlemen on the Republican side of the aisle meet themselves coming back. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] says we will pervert and debauch the farm loan system if we authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit $50,000,000 in the land banks in order to enable them to function as provided by the Senate bill—that the money of all the people will be used to make loans to the agricultural interests of the Nation. Yet in the next breath we are told that the $25,000,000 which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to deposit under the committee amendment is all that the system requires in order to resume its operations and meet the demands for loans. If it is true as contended that $25,000,000 will fill every requirement and meet every need of the land banks, what harm can come of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit a larger amount? If it is not necessary and the money will not be used, no harm can come from giving the Secretary the power. If it is needed, every friend of the farm loan system who desires to see the banks resume operation ought to vote for the original sum provided in the Senate bill.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman has misunderstood me. I meant to say that additional $25,000,000 that was sought was not to make the system function, but to make loans in addition.

Mr. STEAGALL. But if the $25,000,000 is all that the system requires, I want to ask you gentlemen on this side why it is you are afraid to invest a Republican Secretary of the Treasury with the power to deposit to the extent of $50,000,000. There is absolutely no distinction in the principle involved, no difference in the language of the bill as to its operation or as to the manner in which the funds are to be used. The only difference is in the amount, and certainly there can not be any danger in allowing the Secretary of the Treasury complete authority to deposit funds sufficient to take care of the situation. How is it that you are willing to trust him to use his discretion in depositing funds to the amount of $25,000,000, but are unwilling to trust him to the amount of $50,000,000?

Now, the same discretion ought to be given the Secretary of the Treasury in the matter of calling for the deposits made with the land banks that is allowed in placing such funds with the banks originally. In authorizing the Secretary to make the deposits to enable the banks to function in the interest of the farmers of the Nation the framers of the committee amendment were quite content to say that the Secretary may make such deposits, leaving the matter to his good judgment and discretion. But, when it comes to withdrawing such deposits from the banks the framers of the committee amendment have provided that the Secretary of the Treasury shall make demand for the return of such deposits 15 days after the offering of bonds for sale, leaving no discretion whatever. It may be true that "offerings" as used in this act would be construed to mean the completion of the sale of bonds, but we can not tell what some person not too friendly to the farm loan system might construe the language to mean. We ought not to take any chances in the matter, but we should give the Secretary of the Treasury full power and discretion to leave the deposits in the banks until the purpose sought is accomplished. I do not know whether members of the Farm Loan Board agree to the language in the committee amendment or not. I do not know whether or not their attention was called to the possible construction of which the language is susceptible. The hearings have never been published and are not before Members of the House Gentlemen who should have had them here have been too busy attending conferences called by the opponents of the Senate bill for the deposit of $50,000,000 in the land banks. The language of the bill would not receive the notice as to its technical meaning from members of the Farm Loan Board that would naturally be given by lawyers. Members of the Farm Loan Board would not appreciate the technical construction of the words as would the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], who is one of the ablest lawyers in this House. His amendment should be adopted and vest in the Secretary of the Treasury full discretion to leave the deposits authorized in the hands of the banks, not only until there is an offering of bonds for sale, but until the necessary sale of bonds can be fully completed. Why is it Members of the House are afraid to place this discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury? I congratulate the country that we have a Secretary of the Treasury whom Republicans of the House fear may become too friendly to the interests of the farmers of the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. I ask for two minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the debate has been fixed by the vote of the House.

Mr. STEAGALL. I did not so understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. STEVENSON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 110.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are called for. Those who desire that this vote be taken by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number. Tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 32 of the Federal farm loan act approved July 17, 1916, as amended, is hereby amended by adding, after the first paragraph, a new paragraph to read as follows:

"'Until such time as the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks shall be $75,000,000, or more, the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, make deposits in addition to those authorized by the preceding paragraph, to be secured, redeemed, and paid in the same manner as provided in such paragraph, except that any additional deposit made hereunder may be withdrawn by the Secretary of the Treasury at any time after 15 days after the conclusion of each general sale of farm loan bonds by such bank or banks. The aggregate of such additional deposits outstanding at any time shall not exceed the difference between the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks on the last day of the preceding month and the sum of $75,000,000. The certificates of indebtedness issued to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Federal land bank for such additional deposits shall bear a rate of interest not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the last bond issue of the land bank receiving such deposits.'"

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. McFADDEN. There are only two propositions before the House, and the House has just voted down both of those propositions. I submit that this is a repetition.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is certainly very much in error. While the change is very slight, yet there is a slight change. There are really two changes, I will say to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have an amendment to the original text. The offering of this substitute will not forbid the offering of that amendment later, will it? If it would, I would like to offer it now.

The CHAIRMAN. If the substitute of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] is adopted, it would cut off the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. WINGO. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair will permit, I understand that the gentleman from Texas has a perfecting amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] now pending is a substitute for the entire proposition before the committee. A perfecting amendment would certainly take precedence of the amendment in the nature of a substitute. I think it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] did not rise until the substitute was before the House.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I rose, but did not get recognition. Immediately after the amendment had been read I rose to a parliamentary inquiry, but before I was recognized the gentleman offered his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regrets very much not having seen the gentleman.

Mr. McFADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto and all amendments to the bill close in 20 minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will object if the gentleman is going to include all amendments. I will not object to closing debate on this one, but if he is going to try to close debate on the bill, I will object.

Mr. McFADDEN. I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute is pending.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I know, but it is permissible to offer an amendment to the amendment, and to have the substitute pending and an amendment to the substitute. I offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is entitled to offer his amendment as there is no other amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized to offer a perfecting amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 2, line 16, after the word "Treasury," strike out the remaining part of line 16 and insert in lieu thereof the words "is authorized and directed to."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the making of the deposits either is or is not a good thing. If it is a good thing I do not see any reason why it should be made discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury as to whether he will make such deposits. In fact, some of the troubles which we have at the present time in the financial system are because we have given too much discretion to some of those who control the financial credits of the country. I believe it is all right to leave in the discretion of any of the departmental officers of this Government administrative features of any measure, the carrying out of the provisions of the bill, but this is the heart of the bill. The whole thing that the bill covers is whether or not the deposit is going to be made, and we simply say it "may" be made. It is all right to leave the details or the administrative part of it—the question in what form it shall be deposited, whether silver or notes, or in what form of legal tender it may be deposited—in the discretion of the departmental officer. But here is the House of Representatives legislating on a single question saying nothing in the legislation because I dare say that the Secretary of the Treasury might deposit that money now if he wanted to without any further authority of law. The real question at issue is whether or not the deposit shall be made. I say that the language should read "is authorized and directed to make the deposit."

There is no better security on the face of the earth than these land bonds. It is perfectly secure. Do not you want it done, and if you do want it, why do not you say so? If there is any objection in the world to making this mandatory, I am unable to see it. It goes without saying that this small amount will always be in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and if Congress wants to relieve the situation which is very distressing, it seems to me, we should write the law in such a way that no one can make a mistake. As I intimated a while ago, we are suffering now because some departmental officers were given too much discretion in the way of controlling credits, and this bill is in a way a corrective of that very situation. Why should not you say what you mean in connection with the transaction?

This measure leaves it discretionary with the Secretary as to whether he shall deposit, but makes the withdrawal mandatory. If you can trust his discretion in depositing, why can not you trust him in withdrawing the funds? The depositing of the funds should be made mandatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, after what has developed in the debate I think it should be stated that when the farm loan act was passed in 1916, under Democratic control, they only appropriated for the operation of this system $6,000,000. The system has not been able to function. Now, the Republican Congress is appropriating in this special legislation $25,000,000, or approximately that amount, which will enable this system to completely function.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. There is one matter that the gentleman has forgotten, that there were $9,000,000 of stock besides the $6,000,000 deposit.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is right, and I accept the gentleman's correction. But the system during the first and last periods of its operation was not able to function. The amendment we are proposing to-day will permit the system to function.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. There have been a good many statements made on the floor of the House which have led to confusion on my part. Did any man connected with the Farm Loan Board make a request for more money than is given by this bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. They did not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to detract from any credit due the then Democratic majority for their work on behalf of the farm loan system. The matter had been under debate for a great many years; sentiment finally crystallized in regard to it. The bill passed the House, supported by both sides. Since the Republicans came into power in the Congress it has kept them pretty busy repealing or amending, modifying, and improving legislation which the Democratic brethren enacted during their period of power and control in the Congress. We are engaged now in the task of making workable the farm loan system.

When the farm loan bill was before Congress there were quite a number of gentlemen who believed that the system would not operate satisfactorily without a larger amount of working capital than was provided—the working capital of nine million and the six million which the Secretary was authorized to advance, making $15,000,000 of working capital. That was all that was provided for in the beginning. It has been demonstrated that it was not enough. I am criticizing no one because a more liberal provision was not made. It became apparent early in the operation of the farm loan system that a larger amount of working capital was needed. Gentlemen in charge of and responsible for the farm loan system believed that they needed a working capital of about $50,000,000. When the bill was first introduced in the Senate the matter had not, I imagine, been given the most careful consideration; some one seems to have forgotten that the system has acquired a working capital of $25,000,000 in addition to the $6,000,000 which the Secretary of the Treasury may advance. It was finally agreed that the bill as now presented to the House would accomplish what the Farm Loan Board desired and more than they may originally have had in mind. They thought they should have a working capital of $50,000,000. As a matter of fact, the bill before us assures a working capital of $50,000,000 in addition to the original $6,000,000 which the Secretary may advance.

Just why some gentlemen on the Democratic side agonize because we do not make available a sum beyond what is needed, beyond what is required, beyond what is asked for, I do not know, except they may have an idea that the farmer of the country believes that you are not doing the right thing by him unless you open the doors of the Treasury without limit, ostensibly in his behalf. Now, of all the sane, sensible people in this world, the farmer is the most sane and dependable. He does not expect us to buy farm loan bonds with the people's money. All he has asked Congress to do is to make this farm loan system workable, and we are proceeding to make it workable under the plan of those responsible for it, giving every penny and more that they with their knowledge and information in regard to it believe is necessary. When this bill passes, the Farm Loan Board, now having a capital of $25,000,000, will have that available as counter money, they will have $6,000,000, which the original act provided, and in addition the Secretary of the Treasury may advance not to exceed $25,000,000, the sum of the difference between their capital stock and $50,000,000. It is a most satisfactory perfection of the farm loan system.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will it expedite the passage of the tariff bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. It ought to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. All time has expired. The first vote is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 50, noes 117.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The next vote is on the amendment to the Senate bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 114, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1837, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is already ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 132, noes 73.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 219, nays 104, answered "present" 2, not voting 105, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. OLPP with Mr. COLLINS.

Mr. FORDNEY with Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye." I recall that I have a general pair with the gentleman from Florida, Mr. CLARK. I understand he is not present, and I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. LANGLEY was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. MCFADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman has a request to make about the order of business on Monday. Would the gentleman object to submitting that first?

Mr. MONDELL. No. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the next unanimous-consent day is the 4th of July, when we will not be in session. I ask unanimous consent that the business that would be in order on a week from Monday be in order on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the business that would be in order on a week from Monday be in order next Monday. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, of course the unanimous-consent rule provides that one can put a bill on three days before the occurrence of the day. The gentleman is asking that business that would be in order on a week from next Monday be in order next Monday. That would make no practical difference. But let me ask the gentleman, in order that there may be a clear understanding, if we can have it—unanimous-consent day, of course, means that suspensions are in order?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have understood that probably if this consent were had that there would be two recognitions for suspension on Monday?

Mr. MONDELL. That, of course, is entirely in the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Entirely so.

Mr. MONDELL. And I should not want to express any opinion in the matter, because that is for the Speaker to determine.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, without desiring in any way to infringe upon the prerogatives of the Speaker, I think it would be very interesting to Members to know if this consent is granted what bills would be considered—I do not mean all—but if there are any particular bills that have been arranged for as to recognition on that day to move to suspend the rules, I think it would not be an act of impropriety that the House should now know of it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Any bills of wide national interest.

The SPEAKER. As has been suggested, the Chair thinks the House is entitled to know. The Chair at present would be inclined to permit a motion to pass the roads bill and the bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee amending the Volstead bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, to what does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I object to the consideration of a bill of such wide general interest as the Volstead bill, under unanimous consent——

Mr. MONDELL. We can arrange for some additional time.

Mr. GRIFFIN (continuing). On which the debate will be 40 minutes, 20 minutes on a side. And I have no objection to the consideration of the bill on Monday, but——

Mr. MONDELL. We can have two hours' additional debate, possibly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think if the gentleman were to amend his request so as to provide for adequate debate on the bill, I would be inclined to withdraw my objection.

Mr. MONDELL. How much debate would the gentleman desire?

Mr. STAFFORD. I suggest we ought to have an hour on a side on that important bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The apprehensions of the gentleman from New York are not well founded, because the Volstead bill which he mentions has been chloroformed in the Rules Committee, and it is an entirely different proposition that the Speaker is going to recognize the gentleman to bring up.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish the statement were really true that it had been chloroformed.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I modify my request, that should the Speaker recognize the gentleman from Minnesota to call up his bill that has been referred to, there shall be an hour's debate in addition to the debate allowed under the rule.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I think, in view of the importance of this bill and the number of States and districts which desire to be heard from on it, we ought to have more time. You have the strength to pass the bill, I have no doubt about that, but I think the House ought to hear the Representatives from the different parts of the country. Two hours on a side is the least that ought to be given to this proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. Would an hour on a side, in addition to the 40 minutes under the rule, be sufficient?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not think so.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman realizes a rule can be brought in limiting the time to 30 minutes, and that the rule would pass, and I am sure the gentleman does not want to be unreasonable. I want to be reasonable.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman is perfectly right there. I do not.

Mr. MONDELL. Would the gentleman be agreeable to an hour on a side in addition to the time provided under the rule?

Mr. GRIFFIN. How about an hour and a half on a side?

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, there are in the House a number of Members who are anxious to speak against the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. HILL. I object, anyway, to having the bill brought up; but we ought to have four hours against the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I object.

Mr. TINKHAM. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the only interest that I had in making the inquiries which I made of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] touching the order of business was to bring out the business that would be before the House on Monday. The gentleman from Wyoming and others, of whom I was one, have been making the best efforts we could to arrange a program of business for Monday and Tuesday that would accommodate as nearly as possible the Members of the House. Of course, the program for Tuesday is already arranged as definitely as it can be arranged. Now, it is the desire of the gentleman from Wyoming, and, as I understand, of the Speaker, according to the statements made from the chair, to have these two matters brought up on Monday.

It seems to me that all the gentlemen are interested in, concerning that matter, is that they have full notice of when those measures are to be up, so that they can be sure to be here, and I am wondering if it is not possible that Monday would be just as convenient a day on which to have those matters brought up as any other. They can be brought up under a rule. If the gentleman from Wyoming desires, I will object to an adjournment over to-morrow, and we will see what can be done about the rule matter.

Mr. MONDELL. I would not want the gentleman to do that, because I feel that it would inconvenience many Members. The gentleman from Tennessee is always here, as I am, but it would inconvenience many other gentlemen if they were obliged to be in attendance on a session to-morrow. It is with a view of accommodating them that I made my first request. I still hope that no objection will be made to the request I first made. May I make this suggestion to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], that we have two hours' debate on a side on the bill to which he refers.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KINDRED. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, to the proposition for unanimous consent before the House, I want to say that on a measure of such far-reaching importance I desire 20 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. KINDRED. This is the regular order. Otherwise I shall be constrained to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my demand for the regular order if the gentleman wants to make a 20-minute speech.

Mr. KINDRED. Then, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdraws his objection. Is there objection? [After a pause.] Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to make this additional suggestion: Gentlemen are all interested as to arranging a recess for the Fourth of July. I am not prepared at this time to submit a request for adjournment over the Fourth, but what has been running through my mind as a plan which might be practicable is this, that we meet on Saturday, July 2, with the understanding that no business will be transacted, and that the motion to adjourn will be made immediately on convening, so that the adjournment of business will actually occur on Friday next, and that when we adjourn Saturday, July 2, we adjourn to meet on Wednesday, July 6. [Applause.] I would like to have gentlemen think that over, and at a later date if that seems to be the most satisfactory arrangement, I will submit a request as suggested.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL MONDAY.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman renew his request to adjourn over to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. Gentlemen have asked that I submit the request for recess over the Fourth now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not yet submitted his request as to to-morrow.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that when we adjourn to-night we adjourn to meet on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when we adjourn to-night we adjourn to meet on Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER FROM JULY 2 TO JULY 6.

Mr. MONDELL. I now ask unanimous consent that when we adjourn on Saturday, July 2, a week from to-morrow, we adjourn until the following Wednesday, July 6, with the understanding, Mr. Speaker, that no business is to be transacted at the meeting on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when we adjourn on Saturday, a week from to-morrow, we adjourn to meet on the following Wednesday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON THE NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I submit the conference report on the naval appropriation bill for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan submits the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill (H. R. 4803) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. STOLL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized to say for my colleague, Mr. ROUSE, who is unavoidably absent, that he would, if present, have voted "aye" on the bill just passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some confusion and misunderstanding among Members. The agreement to make unanimous consent in order on Monday was made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that that was agreed to, with the understanding that there was to be two hours' debate on each side on the Volstead bill, if it was taken up.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, this being the day set aside for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, I ask that the bills be taken up in their order.

The SPEAKER. The bills that have been laid aside?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; the bills on the Private Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that the House consider those bills in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bills on the Private Calendar be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that we have no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. I will reserve the point, if I am allowed to do so, to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it.

NATURALIZATION.

Mr. MAPES. The first bill on the Private Calendar, I believe, is a bill reported by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, and a similar bill coming from the Senate has been voted on by the House. Would it be in order to bring up the bill reported by the House committee on the same subject?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see why not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, pending the decision on the parliamentary inquiry, I was about to make the same inquiry, and if informed that the House is entitled to consider this resolution, House joint resolution 34, which is the Emil Fischer naturalization bill, I was going to ask that it be rereferred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest that the gentleman ask unanimous consent that the Senate joint resolution 38 and the House resolution be referred, both of them, to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that as to the House joint resolution 34 and the Senate joint resolution 38 of similar tenor now on the Speaker's table, one be referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and the other rereferred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that House joint resolution 34 and the Senate joint resolution 38 of the same import which the House refused the third reading be referred and rereferred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. I withdraw my point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if we should go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar, would bills on that calendar come up as a matter of right against any objection that might be made to them? That is, would they be subject to unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. They would not be subject to unanimous consent.

Mr. BLANTON. They would then come up as a matter of right, and this Fischer bill is the first one on call?

The SPEAKER. That has been disposed of.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the first one on call would come up as a matter of right?

The SPEAKER. The next one on call; yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill on that calendar.

E. W. M'COMAS.

The first business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1945) for the relief of E. W. McComas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That E. W. McComas be permitted to purchase from the United States, at the price of $1.25 per acre, lots 2 and 4 of section 5, the north half of the northeast quarter, and lots 1 and 2 (or the north half of the northwest quarter) of section 7, township 5 north, range 30 east, Willamette meridian, in Umatilla County, Oreg., containing 205.72 acres, more or less, and that patent shall, after such purchase, issue to him therefor: Provided, That McComas files in the district land office at La Grande a proper application to purchase the said lands, and tenders payment therefor at the price fixed herein, within 60 days of the passage of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to put an inquiry to the gentleman who reported this bill [Mr. SINNOTT] as to the character of the improvements that have been made by the claimant. In reading the report I notice that some of these lands are suitable for water-power purposes. Will the gentleman inform the committee as to what rights the Government is surrendering to these lands which are particularly adapted to water-power purposes?

Mr. SINNOTT. As to the value of the improvements, Mr. McComas and his predecessor devoted more than $10,000 to improving these lands. They have a barn and the ordinary farm buildings and an orchard of some 40 acres upon the land, and alfalfa and a pumping plant.

As to the water-power matter that the gentleman refers to, this land is on an island in the Columbia River, and is in one of the blanket omnibus water-power withdrawals on that river. About 8 miles below this point there are some rapids in the river, and whenever some one is ready to spend from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 in improving the rapids it may back up the water toward this island. It is not likely that in the very near future any of this land will be used for water-power purposes. Only 45 acres of the 205 would be involved anyway. A small part of it may be flooded a little, and that is all that will ever be used for that purpose. The potential water power that may be developed is very valuable, but the value of the 45 acres involved is very small in comparison to the magnitude of the project.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any land between the site to be transferred to the grantee here and the proposed water-power site, which is owned privately, that would interfere with the building of this proposed water-power project?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, there are privately owned lands on both sides of the river that might be needed for the water-power project.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any islands between this land and the proposed water-power project? I notice from reading the letter of the Secretary of the Interior that this is quite an extensive proposal which is involved in the withdrawal of these lands. For 12½ miles on either side of the river the public lands have been withdrawn. Can the gentleman inform the committee what proportion of those lands on the banks of the river are held in private ownership and what are owned by the Government?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; I can not tell exactly. Of course, the river bank between low-water mark and high-water mark belongs to the State. In some cases the State may have deeded away that land. Then, above the ordinary high-water mark on both sides of the river there are privately owned lands. I may say to the gentleman that below this point there is another big water-power possibility. Between this point and my town there is a possibility of developing immense power.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is personally acquainted with the land involved?

Mr. SINNOTT. I have seen these lands, have passed them a number of times.

Mr. STAFFORD. And it is the gentleman's opinion that there is no likelihood of any power being developed on the site withheld by the Government, say, in the next 25 or 30 years?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, there is always a possibility.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but is there at present any project in contemplation for the building of water power which would involve these lands?

Mr. SINNOTT. The matter is being agitated all the time at these various points along the Columbia River. It is being agitated in my town, where there is a possibility of developing 800,000 horsepower. Some of the reports have been favorable and some have been adverse. The people who live along there would like to see these greater water powers on the Columbia River developed, but there is no immediate prospect of that development.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the project was financially feasible, what industrial community would be supplied with power from the proposed site?

Mr. SINNOTT. The power could be conducted three or four hundred miles to Portland, Seattle, Salem, Spokane, and various other towns, but there are other power projects on the Columbia and its tributaries.

Mr. STAFFORD. More practicable than this?

Mr. SINNOTT. There is power along the Deschutes River, some 50 or 75 miles nearer to Portland, where they can develop 500,000 horsepower, from a river that in 100 miles drops over 1,100 feet.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire as to another matter, whether the mineral land rights are reserved as far as this land is concerned.

Mr. SINNOTT. No; he would get an absolute title, but there are no minerals in that vicinity.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

AUGUSTUS S. PEABODY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3250) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to convey to Augustus S. Peabody certain land in Galveston County, Tex.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized to convey to Augustus S. Peabody, of Chicago, Cook County, Ill., grantee of all rights, title, and interest of the Texas City Co., all the following described tracts or parcels of land in Galveston County, Tex., known, designated, and described as follows, to wit: Being a part of lot No. 9, in block No. 47, first division of the town of Texas City, Galveston County, Tex., and beginning at the southwest corner of said lot No. 9; thence north along the west line of said lot 47 feet to a corner; thence east at right angle 25 feet; thence south along the east line of said lot 47 feet; thence west with the south line of said lot 25 feet to the place of beginning. Also that certain tract or parcel of land, being a square of 15 feet, and being a part of Bay Street, in the town of Texas City, Galveston County, Tex., and beginning at a point 62 feet east of the east line of block 9, first division of said town of Texas City, and 78 feet north of the southeast corner of said block 9; thence north 15 feet; thence east 15 feet; thence south 15 feet; thence west 15 feet to the place of beginning; all of which tracts or parcels of land were granted and conveyed to the United States by the Texas City Co. in May, 1906, for the nominal consideration of $1 for each tract, and which land was to be used as site for beacons or ranges to mark the Texas City Channel; said tracts of land being no longer needed for the purposes for which they were conveyed, in view of the abandonment of said beacons or ranges formerly established or intended for use upon such tracts: Provided, That such conveyance shall be made without expense to either party, except that the said Augustus S. Peabody shall pay a consideration of $2 and such expenses as are incident to the preparation and recording of the necessary title papers for the purpose of obtaining title to the said tracts and sites upon which beacons or shore ranges were established.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN CESTNIK, JR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5511) for the relief of John Cestnik, jr.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Northern Pacific Railway Co., upon its filing with the Secretary of the Interior a proper relinquishment disclaiming in favor of the United States all title and interest in or to the south half of the southwest quarter, section 11, township 8 south, range 20 east, in the Bozeman, Mont., land district, under its mineral indemnity selection, list No. 146, embracing said tract, shall be entitled to select and receive a patent for other vacant unreserved nonmineral public lands of an equal area in that State; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to permit, after the filing of such relinquishment by said railway company, the homestead entry of John Cestnik, jr., to remain intact as though said entry had been properly allowed, the same to remain subject to compliance with the laws governing entries of like character.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I notice from the report of the former First Assistant Secretary of the Interior that this land which is sought to be transferred to Mr. Cestnik was appraised at $90 an acre. You propose to authorize this transfer to him without the payment of anything at all.

Mr. SINNOTT. This man will only get a limited patent. He will get a surface right because it was classed as coal land when he made his filing, and under the act of June 10, 1910, he merely gets a limited right, a surface right, with the reservation of the coal in the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is certain about that, is he, because the bill does not contain any reservation of the coal and mineral rights.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; it is an entry upon land declared to be coal lands, and under the law he will only get a surface right.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the character of the land?

Mr. SINNOTT. I assume that it is agricultural land, otherwise the man would not have gone there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has he been the occupant of the land ever since his claim was rejected in 1916?

Mr. SINNOTT. I assume that he has; if not, he would not have spent this amount of money on the land.

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct the gentleman's attention to the phraseology permitting the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to exchange other land of an equal area, and ask the gentleman whether this would grant the company the right to select mineral lands of the same character?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; the Northern Pacific Co. has a prior right to this land over Mr. Cestnik, and in lieu of this land it can only take vacant unreserved nonmineral public land.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF THE HEIRS OF ROBERT LAIRD M'CORMICK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 962) for the relief of the heirs of Robert Laird McCormick, deceased.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the heirs of Robert Laird McCormick, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $51.50 in full settlement of the claim of the said Robert Laird McCormick for cashing on insufficient indorsement Post Office Department warrant No. 11415, drawn April 28, 1887, to the order of Charles Perry for $51.50.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, it appears that Charles Perry cashed a check for Robert McCormick and when it was received at the Treasury Department it was decided that the indorsement was not sufficient. Perry disappeared, and it seems right that we should see that the check is properly cashed. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Bank of Hayward, Wis., cashed a Post Office Department warrant for $51.50 issued to Charles Perry in 1887—34 years ago. Perry disappeared and his wife undertook to sign it. The bank made the payment of $51.50, but the auditor refused to acknowledge the signature. The money has been lying down there for 34 years because it could not be paid without an act of Congress. I do not think there is anything more to be said about it.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY JONES FORD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5549) for the relief of Henry Jones Ford.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the disbursing clerk of the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, from the appropriation for salaries of commissioners for the fiscal year 1921, to Henry Jones Ford the sum of $8,800 on account of service rendered as Interstate Commerce Commissioner from June 11, 1920, to March 4, 1921, as full compensation for services rendered, notwithstanding the fact that he was not confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this bill, and particularly the report, is very illuminating in respect to the reasons why we should pass it. It is a bill that really has no right to be referred to or to be reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That committee has no jurisdiction over claims. However, I do not wish to make this point, because I assume the bill has some merit. I can not glean any merit, however, from the report. The report consists of six lines, and it might be well to acquaint those who have not examined the report with its illuminating character. It says:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5549) for the relief of Henry Jones Ford, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

A letter from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission is attached herewith and made a part of this report.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I shall be very glad to yield, for some information and illumination, to the distinguished gentleman, because I know that I shall receive it from him.

Mr. FESS. Did we not act upon this in the deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, it probably would be all right to enlighten the gentleman from Wisconsin in respect to the merits of the bill were it not for the fact that it is already a law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am obliged for that information, and I shall cease my activity to obtain enlightenment.

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. This relief was embodied in the deficiency appropriation bill which became a law on the 16th of June.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not get any enlightenment, but it is not necessary to receive it. I move that the bill be laid aside, with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. If it is in order to enlighten the gentleman as to the merits of the proposition——

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not necessary if it is a part of the law.

Mr. BLANTON. Are there any other of these private bills on the calendar which were not incorporated in the deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman asks me whether I know of any, I will say that I do not. Whether there are, I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to lay the bill aside, with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MIKE CAMPBELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3116) validating the homestead entry of Mike Campbell for certain public land in Alaska.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the entry hereinafter described be, and the same is hereby, validated and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue patent thereon upon the submission of satisfactory proof of compliance with the provisions of the act of June 6, 1912 (37 Stats., p. 123):

Homestead entry, Juneau, Alaska, No. 03986, made by Mike Campbell on July 14, 1919, for the west half of the northwest quarter, the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter, section 36, township 13 north, range 4 west, Seward meridian, and in lieu of that tract, the Territory of Alaska shall have the right to select equal area of public land of the character subject to selection under its school land grant.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

TH. BROVIG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4620) for the relief of Th. Brovig.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim asserted by Th. Brovig, owner of the Norwegian bark Bennestvet, for damages alleged to have been suffered in a collision which occurred in Hampton Roads on the 29th day of June, 1919, between the United States barge F. W. Babcock and the bark Bennestvet by reason of said collision may be submitted to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, the district in which said collision occurred, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the damages sustained, either for or against the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability, with costs, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the said Th. Brovig, owner of the said bark Bennestvet, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid to those entitled thereto or their proctors of record, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That appropriate proceedings to determine such liability and damage shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the claim of Th. Brovig, owner of the Norwegian bark Bennestvet, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between the said vessel and the U. S. barge F. W. Babcock in Hampton Roads, on the 29th day of June, 1919, may be sued for by the said Th. Brovig in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of Th. Brovig, or against Th. Brovig in favor of the United States upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the bill is not properly on the calendar, that it is in violation of the rules of the House in that the Committee on Claims had no jurisdiction over it because it provides payment out of the Treasury of any money not otherwise appropriated. The Committee on Claims has no appropriating power. The portion of the bill to which I refer is in the original bill and not in the amendment, and is to be found on page 2 in lines 11, 12, and 13.

Mr. EDMONDS. The appropriating clause has been stricken out in the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. That is true, but the Committee of the Whole House might not agree with the gentleman in permitting the striking of that out. That is just the action of the Committee on Claims. The bill itself is such a bill that the Committee on Claims has no authority or jurisdiction over it whatever to even consider it, under the rules of the House. The new rules of the House permit only such bills to go to the Committee on Claims that have no appropriation in them, and the Committee of the Whole House does not permit the Committee on Claims to consider any bill that has an appropriation that is made out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman refer to the new rule?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that the new rule enumerated the committees that could not make appropriations and did not include the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. It was the purpose and intention of that rule and the purpose and intention of the House that passed it, to take the appropriating power out of every committee of this House except one, and that is, the Committee on Appropriations, and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, I believe, discussed that proposition on the floor at the time.

Mr. FESS. I did.

Mr. BLANTON. And was in favor of it because he said that the appropriating power ought to be lodged in only one committee. He did not say that it should be lodged in two committees, in the Committee on Appropriations and also in the Committee on Claims. As a matter of fact there are bills that had been up to that time pending before the Committee on Claims that involved as much as $100,000,000.

Mr. FESS. Is it not a rule of law, where you undertake to enumerate, that it excludes those not enumerated?

Mr. BLANTON. Fortunately the Supreme Court in passing upon laws lays very great stress upon the purpose and intention of Congress. That court takes into consideration largely the intent and purpose of Congress on the subject, and the purpose and intent of Congress I submit to the distinguished gentleman was to lodge in one committee only the appropriating power.

Mr. FESS. I think my friend from Texas is right in the main in respect to lodging the appropriating power in one committee, but the Committee on Claims deals entirely with claims against the Government, and I think that the Committee on Claims ought to be an exception.

Mr. BLANTON. As evidence of the fact that my statement is correct in respect to what was the purpose and intention of Congress, I submit to the distinguished gentleman that the Committee on Claims has realized that fact and has acted upon it, in that it has refused to report out bills to this House that appropriate money.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to call attention to the fact that the first bill we passed appropriated money out of the Treasury.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the one the gentleman told me he was going to raise the point of order on.

Mr. EDMONDS. I was waiting for somebody to raise the point of order——

Mr. BLANTON. In order to get the Chair's ruling, and he did not do it. He did not do what he told me he was going to do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is not up to the chairman to raise the point of order on a bill reported by his committee.

Mr. BLANTON. There are other bills pending there, and the chairman and his committee merely have authority to authorize an appropriation and not to appropriate.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, as near as I can see it the objection of the gentleman is that a bill that carries an appropriation should not be referred to the Claims Committee. That in itself is not the rule, because the Member who introduces a bill certainly would expect it to go to the Claims Committee if it is a claim against the Government.

In regard to the contention that the Committee on Claims has no right to appropriate money out of the Treasury, I would like to call the attention of the Chair to Rule XXI, paragraph 4. The rule distinctly says:

No bill for the payment or adjudication of any private claim against the Government shall be referred, except by unanimous consent, to other than the following committees, viz: To the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to the Committee on Pensions, to the Committee on Claims, to the Committee on War Claims, to the Committee on the Public Lands, and to the Committee on Accounts.

Further than that, the resolution of June 1, 1920, provided in paragraph 5:

Paragraph 5. No bill or joint resolution carrying appropriations shall be reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations, nor shall an amendment proposing an appropriation be in order during the consideration of a bill or joint resolution reported by a committee not having that jurisdiction. A question of order on an appropriation in any such bill, joint resolution, or amendment thereto may be raised at any time.

QUESTION.

Is the Committee on Claims a committee having jurisdiction to report appropriations?

We submit that it clearly is, for the following reasons:

1. It has always, during its entire history, reported bills carrying appropriations.

2. Its authority to do so was never questioned.

3. During the periods when the jurisdiction of other committees to report appropriations was suspended or transferred this committee continued to report appropriations to pay claims without question.

4. It is the oldest existing committee, having been established November 13, 1794. Even the Committee on Ways and Means, which combined the duties of raising the revenue and making the general appropriations for current expenses of the Government until the time of the Civil War, was not established until January 7, 1802. From its establishment the Claims Committee reported appropriations for payment of the claims it approved.

5. The order establishing the Claims Committee defined its duties:

"To take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching claims and demands on the United States as shall be presented or shall or may come in question and be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions for relief therein as to them shall seem expedient." (Nov. 13, 1794.)

This remained the rule defining its jurisdiction at least down to 1867 (see Barclay's Digest for 1867, p. 35), and during that entire period it reported bills carrying appropriations for payment of claims, those bills were passed, and it does not appear that such jurisdiction was ever questioned.

6. When the rules were next revised its jurisdiction was described as "subjects relating to private and domestic claims and demands, other than war claims, against the United States," and this language has defined its jurisdiction, without change, to the present time. During all this period precisely as before, this committee has continued, without challenge or question, to report bills carrying appropriations for payment of the claims approved.

7. It seems to be the only committee that has authority to report appropriations for payment of claims other than war claims. Where is authority given the Committee on Appropriations to report an appropriation for payment of a claim? Paragraph 4 of Rule XXI forbids the reference of a private claim to that committee.

The settlement of a claim has always been understood to be in the Claims Committee, and I contend it should have that right and continue to have that right until some definite change is made in our rules.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that there can be any doubt that when the rules were amended so as to transfer all appropriating power to the Appropriations Committee it took away whatever power other committees might have, including the Claims Committee, to appropriate. It can not be said that there was any exception made to any committee having appropriating jurisdiction. The rule contemplated the transfer of all such power from every committee in the House to the Committee on Appropriations, and I believe that a proper consideration of the rule will disclose the fact that no exception was made.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I contend if it had been the intention in the rule to take away from the Committee on Claims or War Claims the power to appropriate they would have had to change paragraph 4 of Rule XXI, and if it was their intention to take away that power it should so have been expressly stated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is questionable in my mind whether the Chair is called upon to pass on the all-important question as to whether the Committee on Claims and other committees have been bereft of appropriating power by reason of the general restriction carried in the new rule adopted on June 1 last. Subsection 5 of Rule XXI is as follows:

No bill or joint resolution carrying appropriations shall be reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations, nor shall an amendment proposing appropriations be in order during the consideration of a bill or joint resolution reported by a committee not having that jurisdiction. A question of order on an appropriation in any such bill, joint resolution, or amendment thereto may be raised at any time.

It is certain that under the rules of the House, even though this bill as introduced carried an appropriation, that it was properly referred to the Committee on Claims. The jurisdiction of that committee is found in the following language:

To private and domestic claims and demands, other than war claims, against the United States, to the Committee on Claims.

Even though this bill as introduced contained an appropriation, as it is clearly a bill relating to a claim against the Government of the United States, I take it it was properly referred to the Committee on Claims. The mere fact that it contains an appropriation did not deprive the Committee on Claims of jurisdiction. I do not take it that just because a bill contains an appropriation that it has to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; otherwise, the powers of all these other committees would be practically nil.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. But when that committee reports a bill it has no jurisdiction to report an appropriation without a point of order lying against the consideration of that bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman suggests a point to which I am just coming and which I prefaced in my introductory remarks, that I did not think the Chair was called upon at this stage of the proceedings to pass upon the question of whether the Committee on Claims had appropriating power, for the reason that the Committee on Claims reports an amendment to a bill that does not contain any appropriation.

Mr. EDMONDS. And which allows a judgment against the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. And which merely authorizes judgment to be levied against the Government in case the district court referred to in the bill finds in favor of the claimant.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, Would not any other committee of the House have had jurisdiction of this bill as it was originally introduced?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the very question which I stated just a moment before the gentleman from South Carolina interrupted me, perhaps when the attention of the Chair was diverted by the colloquy with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. What is the authority of the Committee on Appropriations? If it does not go to the Committee on Claims, I suppose those who advocate that it has been erroneously referred would claim that it goes to the Committee on Appropriations.

What is the authority——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. In just one minute. What is the authority of the Committee on Appropriations over legislation? Clause 3 of Rule XI says:

To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government—to the Committee on Appropriations.

I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but I do not believe it should be the policy for the House to magnify its powers so as to negative the functioning of every other committee of this House and make the Appropriation Committee the Poo-Bah of legislative power.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly this bill should not go to the Committee on Appropriations, because it contains legislation, but because it contains legislation that is no reason why it should go to the Committee on Claims. The rule of the House is——

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman think the bill should be referred?

Mr. BLANTON. It should have been referred to the waste-basket.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield for that kind of a frivolous argument. I decline to yield further unless the gentleman has something sensible to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is seeking information.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish my remarks interpolated by some foolish remark as to the bill being referred to the wastebasket. The gentleman is privileged to use that kind of an argument in his own time, but not in mine.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I originally said, clearly the avowed and declared purpose of the bill as introduced, even though it contained an appropriation, was a claim against the Government. If the Committee on Claims had reported the bill as it was introduced, and if the Committee on Claims has no appropriating power, because it is deprived of that by the new rule——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that we have not a quorum, which takes him off the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not take me off of the floor, but still I have to yield to the superior claim made by the distinguished gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I want somebody to hear his splendid argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman raises the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Forty-seven gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move a call of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. You can not have any call of the House in committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and Mr. FESS having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4620) for the relief of Th. Brovig, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, and that on the roll call 247 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and that he presented therewith a list of the absentees for insertion in the RECORD and the Journal.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] was addressing the House when the point of no quorum was made.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that the gentleman from Texas has withdrawn the point of order on the question of the jurisdiction of the committee?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] tells me that it is his understanding that this power should still remain in the Committee on Claims, and if that is the understanding of the majority leader, I make no further contention and withdraw the point of order.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I object to the withdrawal of the point of order. I would like to have the decision of the Chair on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has no authority over the gentleman from Texas as to the withdrawal of the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. Well, in order to get it settled, Mr. Chairman, since we have gone this far, I will renew the point of order, although I do not think it is subject to a point of order. I do that as a mere formality in order to get the Chair to settle it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair is ready to rule, I do not care to proceed any further.

The CHAIRMAN. House bill 4620 was introduced on the 20th of April and referred to the Committee on Claims. The bill relates to a claim against the Government of the United States. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] made a point of order, which he has withdrawn after argument, but the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] renews the point of order, that the Committee on Claims had no jurisdiction to report this bill; that it calls for an appropriation, and therefore the Committee on Claims was without jurisdiction.

In the last Congress the rules of the House were so changed as to consolidate the ordinary appropriations and revenues of the Government for the support of the Government in one committee. The language of the clause relating to appropriations is as follows:

Rule XI, clause 3: To the appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government * * * to the Committee on Appropriations.

That is to say, there shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations matters relative to the support of the Government out of revenues. This still leaves, in the opinion of the Chair, the retention of their jurisdiction by certain other committees, even though those committees may affect appropriations or may carry an appropriation in the bills that they report. The language of clause 4, Rule XXI, is as follows:

No bill for the payment or adjudication of any private claim against the Government shall be referred, except by unanimous consent, to any other than the following committees, viz: To the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to the Committee on Pensions, to the Committee on Claims, to the Committee on War Claims, to the Committee on the Public Lands, and to the Committee on Accounts.

These committees have exclusive jurisdiction over private claims against the Government.

If this bill had been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, the question of the jurisdiction of that committee could have been successfully raised. If it had been referred to any committee other than the Committee on Claims, the question of the jurisdiction of that other committee could have been successfully raised. No other committee in the House had jurisdiction over this bill.

The rules of the House were made for the purpose of enabling the House to expedite the business of the House. It never was intended by those who created the rules of the House that business could be entirely throttled or interfered with, as was suggested a moment ago, when it was said that this bill could only be referred to the wastebasket. This bill was properly referred to the Committee on Claims, and the Chair believes it was properly reported by that committee.

Every few weeks since the Committee on Appropriations has had exclusive jurisdiction over appropriations for the support of the Government the Committee on Accounts has reported here appropriations out of the contingent fund of the House without any question, and yet the language is so broad here that if it were strictly construed one might think that even the Committee on Accounts is denied the right to make appropriations out of the contingent fund of the House, because clause 5 of Rule XXI says—

No bill or joint resolution carrying appropriations shall be reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations.

The Committee on Accounts has jurisdiction to report appropriations; also the Committee on Claims. Therefore the Chair thinks that the Committee on Claims retains its jurisdiction over private claims against the Government, and that this bill is properly within the jurisdiction of that committee, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, has not the Committee on Accounts jurisdiction only to appropriate out of the contingent fund of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so stated it.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not so understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. But the language of clause 5 is so broad as even to cover that, if it were strictly construed.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not a fact that the contingent fund of the House is appropriated for in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Even without the analogy of the Committee on Accounts being able to make such reports, the Chair is of the opinion that the Committee on Claims has jurisdiction.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, first, on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the farm loan bill.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I present a petition from wounded ex-service men who fought during the war, requesting action upon the soldiers' adjusted compensation act. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD, without the names.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE HOSPITAL No. 38, 345 West Fiftieth Street, New York City.

The Hon. Senator MCCUMBER, of North Dakota,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Whereas we are a few of the wounded ex-service men who fought in the World War, we are extending to you a note of thanks and appreciation toward your earnest efforts and sincere devotion toward the ex-service men of the World War by fighting our battles in the Senate, trying to push through the Senate the adjusted compensation bill for veterans of the World War, and your keen sense of judgment when you explained the condition during the war period and thereafter.

As we said overseas, "Apra la Guerrie." We know as vets, and coming in contact with some more of the veterans of the World War, we need the help of the Government not in a charitable way but by the Congress executing their duty by granting either a cash bonus or a loan, by keeping both the wolf and charitable institutions away.

We understand that you have seen the light! We sincerely hope that your colleagues in the Senate will also see the need of it.

We are sincerely thanking you for your earnest and sincere devotion toward the ex-service men. We are disabled and sick ex-service men in the hospital. We are with you in all our heart and soul for a fight to the finish for passing this bill.

Let's go! Let's go!

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SEWARD, ALASKA.

Mr. NEW. From the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 5222) to provide for the retention by the Government of the property in Seward, Alaska, known as the Alaska Northern Railway Office Building, and its use for court purposes. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill. It involves nothing more than the transfer of a public building from one department of the Government to another.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator think it will involve any debate?

Mr. NEW. I do not think it will take a minute. The Secretary of the Interior writes that the building referred to in the bill is in the possession of the Alaskan Engineering Commission, which commission is now bearing the expense of upkeep. The commission no longer desires the building for railroad purposes, it being occupied by the Department of Justice, which department is anxious to obtain full possession.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the property commonly known as the Alaska Northern Railway Office Building, being situated on lots 16 to 20, inclusive, in block 16, of the town of Seward, Alaska, which was acquired by the United States under the provisions of the act of March 12, 1914, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United Sates to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," shall not be sold under the provisions of the act of July 1, 1916, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," or other like acts, but shall be retained by the United States for use by the officials of the United States district court and the Department of Justice.

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to transfer the custody of said building to the Attorney General for use as above indicated.

All laws or parts of laws to the extent they are in conflict with the provisions of this act are repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEW. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the letter from the Secretary of the Interior to which I referred.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 23, 1921.

Hon. HARRY S. NEW,
Chairman Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On May 16 the House of Representatives passed H. R. 5222, a bill "to provide for the retention by the Government of the property in Seward, Alaska, known as the Alaska Northern Railway Office Building, and its use for court purposes." On May 17 this bill was read in the Senate and referred to your committee.

The office building referred to in this bill is in the possession of the Alaskan Engineering Commission, which commission is now bearing the expense of up-keep. The commission no longer desires the building for railroad purposes, and it is being occupied by the Department of Justice, which department is anxious to obtain full possession.

It would be greatly appreciated if steps were taken toward an early passage of this bill, in order that the Alaskan Engineering Commission may be relieved of the expense and that the Department of Justice may have full possession.

Respectfully,

ALBERT B. FALL, Secretary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2152) to authorize the President, on recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, to accept lands donated to the United States as preserves or refuges for wild birds and animals, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

A bill (S. 2153) authorizing the owners of the steamship Texas to bring suit against the United States of America (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 2154) making appropriation for reimbursement of the Lidgerwood Milling Co., of Lidgerwood, N. Dak., and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 2155) authorizing and directing the Secretary of State to examine and report upon the claim of the Wales Island Packing Co.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, that bill has been before the Committee on Claims for at least 20 years. I remember that it was referred to me as a subcommittee at one time, and the committee reported unfavorably upon it. Since that time it has been referred to others, and the committee has reported unfavorably. Why it should be sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations when it was before the Committee on Claims so long I can not understand.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that when I was a member of the Committee on Claims the bill was before that committee, and was reported adversely. That was about 14 years ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that the Senator from North Dakota requested that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not particular where it goes. I wish to have it referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator has no good reason for sending it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is satisfactory to me, but before there is any action taken by that committee I would respectfully ask that I may have an opportunity to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to refer the bill to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

A bill (S. 2156) granting a pension to Augusta Baumann;

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 2170) to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces of the United States; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

AMENDMENT TO SEASONAL COAL RATE BILL.

Mr. REED submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FEDERAL LAND BANKS.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the action of the House of Representatives on Senate bill 1837 be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1837) to amend section 32 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 32 of the Federal farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916, as amended, is hereby amended by adding after the first paragraph a new paragraph to read as follows:

"Until such time as the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks shall be $50,000,000 or more, the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion make deposits in addition to those authorized by the preceding paragraph, to be secured, redeemed, and paid in the same manner as provided in such paragraph, except that any additional deposit made hereunder shall be called by the Secretary of the Treasury and redeemed by the bank or banks holding the same, within 15 days after the conclusion of each general offering of farm loan bonds by such bank or banks. The aggregate of such additional deposits outstanding at any time shall not exceed the difference between the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks on the last day of the preceding month and the sum of $50,000,000. The certificates of indebtedness issued to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Federal land bank for such additional deposits shall bear a rate of interest not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the last bond issue of the land bank receiving such deposits."

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas to what extent the amount provided for by the Senate in the bill has been reduced by the House?

Mr. CURTIS. The Senate provided for $44,000,000 additional. The House reduced the amount to the difference between the actual paid-in capital stock and $50,000,000, which would limit it to between $24,000,000 and $26,000,000, and they add $6,000,000 to that, which would make about $30,000,000 additional. I have talked with all the members of the Farm Loan Board and they are so anxious because of the emergency to have the bill passed this morning, if possible, that they say they are satisfied they can get along with it as passed by the House.

Mr. SMITH. The members of the Farm Loan Board are of opinion that the amount provided for in the House amendment to the bill is sufficient to meet the emergency?

Mr. CURTIS. They thought so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the bill can only be taken up by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRISON. As I recall the provisions of the bill, there was $50,000,000 appropriated by the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. It would be $46,000,000 as the bill passed the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. As I recall, it passed practically unanimously.

Mr. CURTIS. There was only a little opposition to it.

Mr. HARRISON. The House has cut the amount down to $25,000,000.

UMI

Mr. CURTIS. About $25,000,000, and $6,000,000 additional, which would be $31,000,000, allowing $31,000,000 instead of $44,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. And now the Senator states that he has a communication from the authorities saying that they are willing and hope it will pass in the form in which it passed the House, feeling that that is the best they can get and that they can not get more, I imagine.

Mr. CURTIS. The amount might be increased if the bill went to conference, but they feel that they can get along with this amount if the bill is passed immediately, and they would rather have the bill passed to-day than to have it go to conference, with the consequent delay that would take place.

Mr. HARRISON. They would prefer the Senate proposition to the bill as passed by the House?

Mr. CURTIS. They did want to have the Senate proposition amended somewhat, but I believe it is better to pass it as the House has passed it than to send it to conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

Strike out all after the word "than" in the sixth line of said proviso and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That which could be borrowed lawfully from such State bank or trust company were it a national banking association," so that said proviso when amended shall read as follows:

"Provided, however, That no Federal reserve bank shall be permitted to discount for any State bank or trust company notes, drafts, or bills of exchange of any one borrower who is liable for borrowed money to such State bank or trust company in an amount greater than that which could be borrowed lawfully from such State bank or trust company were it a national banking association."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 387) granting certain public lands to the city of Phoenix, Ariz., for municipal purposes was announced as next in order.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Utah can object to the consideration of this bill, but if it is to be passed at all it should be considered and passed before the end of the present fiscal year. Does the Senator intend to persist in his objection toward the defeat of the measure?

Mr. KING. Yes, Mr. President. I think the bill extravagant and unnecessary.

Mr. PENROSE. I know that the Senator from Utah is a profound financier and is thoroughly familiar with the workings of the Treasury Department. I hesitate very much to disagree with him. No one may listen to him speak at length on an innumerable variety of subjects without being impressed with his knowledge. So when he says he thinks the bill extravagant and unnecessary I am impressed; but if that is his attitude, I shall undertake at the proper time to move the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KING. The sarcasm of the Senator from Pennsylvania does not deter me from insisting on my objection.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not speaking sarcastically; I am endeavoring to speak truthfully, however far I may fail of the mark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

HAWAIIAN FRANCHISES.

The bill (S. 2062) granting a franchise for the purpose of manufacturing and supplying gas and electric current in the districts of Wailuku and Makawao, county of Maui, Territory of Hawaii, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask that that bill and the five succeeding bills be passed over.

Mr. NEW. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not insist upon that objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to examine the bills to which I have referred, and I have not had the opportunity to do so since the calendar was last called. I have collected those bills together with the reports accompanying them; I have taken them to my committee room, and I want an opportunity to go over them carefully. I shall have to insist upon my objection to their consideration until I can have that opportunity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill the title of which has been stated, on the objection of the Senator from Wisconsin, will go over, as will also the five succeeding bills on the calendar, to which the Senator from Wisconsin objects.

The bills referred to are as follows:

A bill (S. 2063) to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric light and power within the district of Hamakua, on the island of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii;

A bill (S. 2065) to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric current for light and power within the district of Hana, on the island of Maui, Territory of Hawaii;

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 32) to change the name of the Grand River in Colorado and Utah to the Colorado River, was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the joint resolution go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will go over.

ALFRED CLUFF AND OTHER SETTLERS AT FORESTDALE, ARIZ.

The bill (S. 391) for the relief of Alfred Cluff and certain other settlers at Forestdale, Apache County, Ariz., who were evicted from their homes by reason of a change in the location of the north boundary of the White Mountain or San Carlos Apache Indian Reservation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it is true that this bill has heretofore twice passed the Senate, but I have sent a copy of the report on the bill, which is very voluminous, to a number of Senators who have advised me that they have not yet had an opportunity to read it, the report consisting of about 50 pages. I therefore ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

HOMESTEADS IN HAWAII.

The bill (S. 1881) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian Homes Commission, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, this bill is known as the Hawaiian rehabilitation bill, and there are peculiar reasons why it should have immediate consideration. Under existing law the lands which are mentioned in the bill and which by its terms are set aside for homesteading by the Hawaiian people are eligible under the general homestead laws for homestead entry by anybody. Unless this bill is passed now and its benefits given to the Hawaiian people I think it manifest that some of these lands, many of them, perhaps, will be homesteaded by others and the Hawaiians probably forever deprived of any opportunity to homestead them.

I wish to say in connection with the bill that it was before the last Congress, not in exactly its present form but in practically the same form. The general object of the bill which was passed by the last House was the same as the general object of the pending measure. After its passage by the House it came to the Senate, and a delegation from Hawaii, which included Gov. McCarthy, the attorney general of Hawaii, several members of the Hawaiian Legislature, representatives of the Hawaiian Chamber of Commerce at Honolulu, and various other persons, came to Washington to urge its passage. In opposition to it there came certain gentlemen who represented what was known as the Parker Ranch and what was known as the Raymond Ranch. The Parker Ranch is the larger of two big ranches and now controls, either by ownership or lease, about 325,000 acres of land. They opposed the passage of the bill and its consideration was held up in the Senate.

The Hawaiian Legislature then asked that the Hawaiian Representative in Congress return to Honolulu and explain to them the character of the objections interposed to the bill when it was considered by the American Congress. Mr. KALANIANAOLE went to Hawaii and explained to them the nature of the objections which had been raised. This bill has been modified to meet those objections as nearly as may be and this bill has passed the Hawaiian Legislature. It passed the Hawaiian Senate unanimously and passed the Hawaiian House of Representatives by a vote of 26 to 4. The pending measure has the indorsement of the outgoing governor, Mr. McCarthy, and the approval of the incoming governor, Mr. Farrington. The bill has been examined by the Interior Department, and on Saturday I personally talked with the Secretary of the Interior, who gave the bill his approval. So far as I know there has been no objection to it except as I have indicated.

I neglected to say that the Parker Ranch interests at the hearing the other day were represented here by Mr. George McK. McClellan, who was formerly secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Honolulu. He came here as representing the Parker Ranch interests and had written authority to do so. He did represent them before our committee and the amendments which he offered were accepted.

All objection was then by him withdrawn to the bill. Since that time and since the committee has reported the bill favorably the committee has been in receipt of a protest from representatives of the Parker Ranch, who say that Mr. McClellan did not have the authority to represent them, despite the fact that Mr. McClellan's authority, as I have said, was presented to the committee in writing, and who protest the passage of the bill and ask that action on it be suspended until a delegation from Congress can go to Hawaii and make a full investigation of the matter.

Mr. President, that will require months, as everybody knows. In the meantime, as I have said, under the operation of law the lands which are now under lease, the leases on which expire on the 30th of June, will become eligible to general homestead entry. I can only cite as an evidence of what will probably become of them if the 30th of June is allowed to come without the passage of this bill by stating that at the last drawing 31 homesteads were allotted, 17 of which went to aliens and the others scattering, no Hawaiian, however, coming in for a single one of the homesteads.

I shall be glad to say anything that may be called for in further explanation of the measure, but I think it ought to have present consideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. KING. As I understand the measure, I am in hearty accord with its provisions. I wish to inquire of the Senator, though, whether provision was made in this bill to prevent the carving up of these very valuable sugar lands and subjecting them to homestead entry?

Mr. NEW. The sugar lands are not opened to homestead entry under this bill. They are not withdrawn, but under the operation of this bill the process is that agricultural lands are made available for homesteads.

Mr. KING. Oh, I understand that; but the point I had in mind was this: When I was in Hawaii a short time ago I made a rather exhaustive investigation concerning the sugar lands, and a policy seemed to have been adopted by which those valuable sugar lands were to be carved up into small homesteads, and ultimately, after they had been homesteaded, the result would be that they would get back into the hands of a few individuals.

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. KING. Those were really the prime assets which the Territory had to meet its obligations. It then had obligations and of necessity it will have obligations in the future, and I felt that some method ought to be adopted to conserve those valuable sugar lands as an asset.

Mr. NEW. The Senator is eminently correct. If they were subjected to the carving process, the value of the sugar lands of Hawaii and that of the Territory as a sugar producer would be utterly destroyed.

Mr. KING. Then, if it does not embrace the sugar lands, I think the measure is very wise and ought to go through.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I just want to say this to the Senate: I appeal to the Senate to pass this bill now for the relief of the Hawaiian people. There are only a few thousand of them left. I think the Hawaiian people should have the advantage of the land affected by the pending bill.

I am perfectly aware that the Parker Ranch people will always object to any legislation that will deprive them of the great advantages that they have enjoyed for the last 50 years, paying nothing to speak of in rents for the three hundred and odd thousand acres of land out of the comparatively few acres of land in those islands. The passage of this bill, after taking care of the Hawaiian people mentioned in the bill, will mean, through the leasing of valuable sugar lands by the Hawaiian government, a revenue of something like $700,000 per annum from a source from which they have had no revenue to speak of in the past.

The Senator from Indiana has well said that this bill ought to become law before the 1st day of July. If not, some of the lands are going to pass out of the hands of the United States, and perhaps ultimately the most valuable of the lands involved will revert to the hands of the Parker Ranch and the other people that have enjoyed the benefits of them first granted years ago by the King.

I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am by no means opposed to this bill. I do not wish to be in the attitude of even suggesting opposition to it. I think that I am in accord with what the Senator from Indiana has said; but it happens that I am to-day in receipt of a very lengthy telegram from a constituent who protests very bitterly against the bill, and says that he has a representative on the way, who will arrive here on the 29th. Under those circumstances, I think that this representative ought to be given the opportunity to present his objections. I ask nothing more than that.

I object to the present consideration of the bill because of this telegram from my constituent, and not because of a personal opposition at all.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, as I have tried to set forth, the reason for immediate consideration lies in the fact that on the 30th of this month these lands, under the operation of the present law, become eligible for general homesteading. I do not know the gentleman who sends this telegram to the Senator from California. The Senator from California has told me that he did not identify him. Perhaps he has identified him since I talked with him before. The Delegate from Hawaii is on the floor, and has told me that he does not know who this gentleman is. The representatives of the Parker Ranch, the Raymond Ranch, and everybody who has any kind of objection to urge to this bill, have already been heard, and have been heard at great length, before two sessions of Congress.

I submit, Mr. President, that it is hardly good faith with the committee for them to ask now that consideration of the bill be withheld until the afternoon of the last day before the damage is done, if damage is to be done, through the failure of this bill to pass. They have had every opportunity to be heard. They have been notified and have had their representatives present. I have cabled them myself. I have done everything in the world I could to give them every opportunity here to present their case, and they have taken the fullest advantage of that opportunity.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I tried to make very plain the theory upon which my objection was made. Possibly I did not succeed. I am not opposed to the bill; but with a telegram like that which I hold in my hand from a constituent of mine, saying that he has a representative coming here and that he will be here on the 29th, I could do nothing else than object in order that he may be given a hearing. This is not a personal objection to the bill at all, I repeat, because I think personally I shall favor it.

It is all poppy-cock to talk about immediate haste in connection with a bill that is presented here to-day; but there is another method by which it may be brought up, and that is by regular motion, in which the Senator doubtless could prevail upon the facts that he asserts; and then, so far as my objection having been made is concerned, I have done all that I could.

But here is the telegram, and I will read it into the RECORD merely in justice to the man who signs it, and for no other reason. He is entitled to be heard like any other man:

Hwaiian rehabilitation bill comes up Senate June 27. Title of bill is pure camouflage for big interests in Hawaii to secure complete monopoly of Hawaiian government lands. Similar bill was presented once before with approval local legislature, which was utterly discredited by public of Hawaii. In the interests of all taxpayers of the Territory this bill should not pass. It repeals clause in organic act limiting land holdings to 1,000 acres. Present homesteading laws give Hawaiians greater opportunities for rehabilitation, as they afford them opportunities of acquiring good lands for agricultural purposes which under this proposed bill will be entirely monopolized by big interests. Nobody really believes that rehabilitation will be anything but costly failure, and the scheme is condemned as vicious class legislation based on deliberate misrepresentation of facts. The proposed legislation is so insidious and far-reaching Senate ought not to act without careful investigation on the ground. Therefore suggest appointment of subcommittee go to Hawaii. No injury can result from delay. G. J. Waller, jr., arrives Washington 29th. Have given him letter to you.

CHARLES REDDY.

I present this telegram. It comes from San Francisco, from a constituent. Personally, I am not opposed to the bill. I believe, however, that any man who presents matters of that sort is entitled to be heard.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I do not at all misunderstand the Senator from California. What he says is all right, but I submit that there is the grossest misstatement of fact contained in this telegram. The sender of the telegram says this bill was before Congress before, and that since that time it has been utterly discredited in Hawaii. Why, nothing could be further from the truth than that. It has been back to Hawaii. It has since passed the Hawaiian Senate by a unanimous vote. It passed the house of representatives by a vote of 26 to 4. It has had the approval of all these gentlemen who have been here within the last few days, and some of whom are still here, and is agreed to by the representatives of the very interests that, I presume, Mr. Reddy represents before the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

In view of these facts, Mr. President, and without the slightest disposition to take radical issue with the Senator from California—he and I, I think, are in full understanding on this matter—I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1881) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian Homes Commission, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments proposed by the committee will be stated.

The first amendment was, on page 4, line 22, to strike out "Keaaupaha" and insert "Keaaukaha."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 19, after the word "except," to insert "by further authorization of Congress and," so as to make the paragraph read:

(1) For a period of five years after the first meeting of the Hawaiian Homes Commission only those lands situate on the island of Molokai, which are particularly named in paragraphs 1 and 3 of section 203 hereof; Waimanu, in the district of Hamakua; Keaaukaha, in the district of South Hilo; and Panaewa, Waiakea, in the district of South Hilo, island of Hawaii, shall be available for use and disposition by said commission under the provisions of this title, and none of the remaining available lands named in said section 203 shall, after the expiration of the said 5-year period, be leased, used, or otherwise disposed of by the commission under the provisions of this title, except by further authorization of Congress and with the written approval of the Secretary of the Interior of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 20, after the word "within," to strike out "two" and insert "three," so as to make the paragraph read:

(3) In case any land is to be selected by the commission out of a larger area of available lands, such land shall not assume the status of Hawaiian home lands until the commission, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, makes the selection and gives notice thereof to the commissioner of public lands. The commission shall give such notice within three years after the expiration of the 5-year period referred to in paragraph 1 of this section. Any such notice given thereafter shall be deemed invalid and of no effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 1, after the word "roads," to strike out "street" and insert "streets," so as to make the paragraph read:

(3) The term "public lands" includes all lands in the Territory of Hawaii classed as government or crown lands previous to August 15, 1895, or acquired by the Government upon or subsequent to such date by purchase, exchange, escheat, or the exercise of the right of eminent domain, or in any other manner; except (1) lands designated in section 203 of the Hawaiian homes commission act, 1920, (2) lands set apart or reserved by Executive order by the President, (3) lands set aside or withdrawn by the governor under the provisions of subdivision (g) of this section, (4) sites of public buildings, lands used for roads, streets, landings, nurseries, parks, tracts reserved for forest growth or conservation of water supply, or other public purposes, and (5) lands to which the United States has relinquished the absolute fee and ownership, unless subsequently placed under the control of the commissioner and given the status of public lands in accordance with the provisions of this act, the Hawaiian homes commission act, 1920, or the Revised Laws of Hawaii of 1915; and

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 6, after the word "any," to strike out "irrigated," so as to make the paragraph read:

(d) No lease of agricultural lands or of undeveloped arid public land which is capable of being converted into agricultural land by the development, for irrigation purposes, of either the underlying or adjacent waters, or both, shall be granted, sold, or renewed by the government of the Territory of Hawaii for a longer period than 15 years. Each such lease shall be sold at public auction to the highest bidder after due notice as provided in subdivision (h) of this section and the laws of the Territory of Hawaii. Each such notice shall state all the terms and conditions of the sale. The land, or any part thereof so leased, may at any time during the term of the lease be withdrawn from the operation thereof for homestead or public purposes, in which case the rent reserved shall be reduced in proportion to the value of the part so withdrawn. Every such lease shall contain a provision to that effect: Provided, That the commissioner may, with the approval of the governor and at least two-thirds of the members of the land board, omit such withdrawal provision from the lease of any lands suitable for the cultivation of sugar cane whenever he deems it advantageous to the Territory of Hawaii. Land so leased shall not be subject to such right of withdrawal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 21, after "May 27," to strike out "1915" and insert "1910," so as to make the paragraph read:

(f) No person shall be entitled to receive any certificate of occupation, right of purchase lease, cash freehold agreement, or special homestead agreement who, or whose husband or wife, has previously taken or held more than 10 acres of land under any such certificate, lease, or agreement made or issued after May 27, 1910, or under any homestead lease or patent based thereon; or who, or whose husband or wife, or both of them, owns other land in the Territory the combined area of which and the land in question exceeds 80 acres; or who is an alien, unless he has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States as provided by law. No person who has so declared his intention and taken or held under any such certificate, lease, or agreement shall continue so to hold or become entitled to a homestead lease or patent of the land, unless he becomes a citizen within five years after so taking.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 8, after "May 27," to strike out "1915" and insert "1910," so as to make the paragraph read:

(g) No public land for which any such certificate, lease, or agreement is issued after May 27, 1910, or any part thereof, or interest therein or control thereof, shall, without the written consent of the commissioner and governor, thereafter, whether before or after a homestead lease or patent has been issued thereon, be or be contracted to be in any way, directly or indirectly, by process of law or otherwise, conveyed, mortgaged, leased, or otherwise transferred to, or acquired or held by or for the benefit of, any alien or corporation; or before or after the issuance of a homestead lease or before the issuance of a patent to or by or for the benefit of any other person; or, after the issuance of a patent, to or by or for the benefit of any person who owns, or holds, or controls, directly or indirectly, other land or the use thereof, the combined area of which and the land in question exceeds 80 acres. The prohibitions of this paragraph shall not apply to transfers or acquisitions by inheritance or between tenants in common.

The amendment was agreed to.

The board shall prepare and submit annually to the governor a report of its official acts during the preceding year, together with its recommendations as to harbor improvements throughout the Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, what was the first amendment that was agreed to in the front part of the bill? I did not catch it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the amendment to which the Senator refers.

LANDS PURCHASED FOR HOMELESS INDIANS.

The bill (S. 1926) to extend the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887, as amended, to lands purchased for Indians was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That unless otherwise specifically provided, the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat. L., p. 388), as amended, be, and they are hereby, extended to all lands heretofore purchased or which may hereafter be purchased by authority of Congress for the use or benefit of any individual Indian or band or tribe of Indians.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Kansas to give an explanation as to the objects of this bill?

Mr. CURTIS. The Government, by virtue of several acts of Congress, has purchased tracts of land in different States for Indian tribes. The appropriations were made in the appropriation bills, and no specific law was made applicable. So the department has asked that the act of 1887, which is a general Indian allotment act, be made applicable to all the lands purchased for Indians in different States. Principally the lands purchased for homeless Indians are located in California, a little less than 35,000 acres; some lands in Minnesota, some lands in Wisconsin, and some in one or two other States.

This bill, let me say, was drawn by the department, and introduced at their request, so that they might have some definite legislation applicable to lands purchased for homeless Indians.

Mr. KING. I will state the reason why I made the inquiry. Knowing that the department contemplated purchasing, if it has not already done so, some arid lands, lands to be distinguished from lands which are owned by the Indians in some sections, I was wondering whether a general statute relating to what might be denominated normal lands would be applicable to some of the dry, arid, subnormal lands which the Government will purchase for the Indians.

Mr. CURTIS. In the purchase of lands and in the allotment of arid and semiarid lands, separate and distinct provisions have been made in reference to their allotment and management. For instance, in New Mexico and Arizona the amount of irrigable land has been limited to 5 or 10 acres, depending on the case, and no doubt if arid or semiarid lands were provided for in the future the legislation would designate what should be done with them, the number of acres to be allotted, and so forth.

Mr. KING. Then there is enough flexibility in existing law, or laws which are to be made applicable to lands hereafter purchased, to permit the department to award to the Indians reasonable acreage, sufficient for their wants?

Mr. CURTIS. I think so.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR SOLDIERS OF THE WORLD WAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

J. L. HOLMES.

The bill (S. 513) granting a deed of quitclaim and release to J. L. Holmes of certain land in the town of Whitefield, Okla., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 7, after the word "interest," to insert the words "in and to lots 2 and 3, block 14, in town site of Whitefield, Okla."; and on page 2, line 3, to strike out the word "scheduled" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "conveyed," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to execute, acknowledge, and deliver, in the name of the United States of America, a deed of quitclaim and release to J. L. Holmes, of Whitefield, Okla., his heirs and assigns, of all the right, title, and interest in and to lots 2 and 3, block 14, in town site of Whitefield, Okla., which was granted to the United States of America by a deed from the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations to the United States of America, dated the 21st day of September, A. D. 1904, and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, said lots having been erroneously conveyed to the United States instead of E. E. Farrell, who subsequently sold and transferred same to J. L. Holmes.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF INDIANS ON RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment, on page 3, line 15, after the word "privilege," to insert "within a period to be fixed by the Secretary," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the land in the Vashon Island abandoned military reservation in sections 1, 2, and 3, all in township 21 north, range 2 east, Willamette meridian, in the county of King, in the State of Washington, to be surveyed and subdivided into tracts and lots to conform as far as practicable to the tracts and lots lawfully occupied by the tenants thereon as lessees or sublessees on May 1, 1920.

MAJ. FRANCIS M. MADDOX, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The bill (S. 1032) for the relief of Maj. Francis M. Maddox, United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to credit the account of Maj. Louis C. Wilson, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, the sum of $1,989.14, to be paid Lieut. Col. Francis M. Maddox, Fourth Regiment Alabama National Guard Infantry, for pay and services rendered from June 4, 1920, to September 30, 1920, inclusive, together with commutation of quarters, light, heat, and longevity pay. Lieut. Col. Francis M. Maddox, performing said duties, having been detailed as assistant to the Chief of the Militia Bureau, War Department, Washington, D. C., and having received no pay for such assignment for period set forth.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] whether the officer during this period received compensation for other services by virtue of some other position which he held?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; he did not, Mr. President. The Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], a member of the Committee on Claims, had charge of the measure in the committee, and he has the report of the committee. I ask him to give the committee's viewpoint to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire how, with the pay which is allowed, the officer could receive so great a sum for practically one month or six weeks of service.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's query, I will say that the service covered the period from June 4 to September 30, inclusive, which, of course, is quite a bit more than one month or six weeks. It is approximately four months' service.

The situation arose in this way:

The War Department called Maj. Maddox, of the National Guard, to the Militia Bureau and gave him an assignment there. After he had been in the service probably six weeks the auditor raised the question that he was not entitled to pay on account of the law not permitting a National Guard officer to be assigned to the Militia Bureau, and made some suggestions as to an amended order which would probably cover the situation. The Secretary of War amended the order, and five or six weeks more elapsed, and then they again raised the question that even under the amended order he was not entitled to his pay. However, they had paid him and did pay him for about two or three months under the order. Then they made a request upon him that he refund the amount he had received. I think the third time the Secretary of War amended the order so as to try to make it meet the objection raised by the auditor and subsequently raised by the Comptroller of the Treasury. It is my understanding that the officer rendered the service and that it was purely on account of a technicality raised by the Comptroller of the Treasury that he did not receive his pay.

Secretary Baker wrote a letter explaining the case fully and recommending the payment of the claim, in which he stated that it was a just debt against the United States; and subsequently Secretary Weeks reviewed the case and wrote a similar letter, which is contained in the files. Both Secretaries recommend the payment as being just and say that the services were rendered. It was upon that showing that the committee unanimously reported in favor of the bill.

Mr. KING. Let me inquire of the Senator whether this officer was receiving compensation during this period for other services because of the other position which he occupied?

Mr. TRAMMELL. He was not receiving other compensation, because he was here in the bureau giving his time to the bureau under the assignment and received no other pay.

Mr. HEFLIN. Hoping and expecting that this money would be paid to him.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Auditor for the War Department first authorized the payment to him of about thirteen hundred and odd dollars, I think, and then, when the Comptroller of the Treasury held that they had no right to pay it, because the Comptroller of the Treasury took the position that they had no right to assign an officer from the National Guard to the Militia Bureau, and, on the other hand, the Secretary of War took the position that they did have a right to do it, they ordered him to refund the thirteen hundred and odd dollars of money that had already been paid over to him.

Mr. KING. And is this now to cover that amount?

Mr. TRAMMELL. This bill covers that thirteen hundred and odd dollars that he refunded and additional services besides that.

Mr. KING. How did this officer happen to be in the War Department and subject to their jurisdiction in the beginning?

Mr. TRAMMELL. He was in the National Guard, and they called him in and assigned him to a post in the Militia Bureau as representing the National Guard in connection with the bureau.

Mr. KING. If he had not received this assignment, what position would he have held with the National Guard or with the Government?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I judge that if he had not received it he would, of course, have remained in his former position until discharged from the service and, of course, would have drawn his salary in the other position.

I may read just the closing paragraph of the letter of Secretary Baker, and Secretary Weeks wrote a similar letter. In fact, I think the letter is worded almost exactly like this one:

> Opinion as to the justice of this claim: The officer in question performed military duty in good faith. The War Department issued orders which, in its opinion, authorized the performance of duty by this officer and his payment from Federal appropriations. There can be no doubt that there is a moral obligation on the part of the Government to pay for services rendered. It is known in the War Department that Congress, in passing section 81 of the act of June 3, 1916, intended to permit the use of National Guard officers as assistants to the Chief of the Military Bureau. The construction placed upon the following provision of law by the comptroller has deprived Maj. Maddox of his just pay.

Then he gives the provisions of the law. He further states that it was the intention of Congress that they should be allowed to call in National Guard officers to be assigned as assistants in this bureau.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF GEORGE A. ROBERTSON.

The bill (S. 496) for the relief of George A. Robertson was announced as next in order, and was read.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Montana tell me whether the department paid Mr. Robertson anything between 1913 and 1916?

Mr. MYERS. He never received anything except his wages. He was working up to the time he was injured, and I do not think he has been in the employ of the Government since. He was incapacitated from pursuing his work.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over to-day. I have not yet had time to read the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND.

The bill (S. 1434) for the relief of the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, Baltimore, Md., was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem, after the 15th day of July, A. D. 1921, United States Treasury Department 5½ per cent coupon certificates of indebtedness, series B–1921, dated July 15, 1920, and due January 15, 1921, Nos. 3298 and 3299, of the denomination of $5,000 each, with interest from July 15, 1920, to the date of maturity of said certificates of indebtedness, January 15, 1921, and also to redeem, after the 15th day of September, A. D. 1921, United States Treasury Department 5½ per cent coupon certificates of indebtedness, series TM2–1921, dated July 15, 1920, and due March 15, 1921, Nos. 2216 and 2217, of the denomination of $5,000 each, with interest from July 15, 1920, to the date of maturity of said certificates of indebtedness, March 15, 1921, in favor of the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, without presentation of said certificates, the certificates of indebtedness having been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said certificates of indebtedness shall not have been previously presented for payment: Provided further, That the said Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland shall first file in the Treasury Department bonds, each in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal and interest of said certificates of indebtedness of the Treasury Department of the United States of America, in such form and with such sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the lost, stolen, or destroyed certificates of indebtedness hereinbefore described.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from Indiana, who I notice reported the bill, if there is any possibility of the Government sustaining any loss if the bill should pass?

Mr. NEW. No, Mr. President. The bill is of a character similar to many which have been passed by Congress. The situation is simply this: There were four certificates of indebtedness, of $5,000 each, stolen from the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland. The company make claim for them, and the bill stipulates, of course, that they are to file a bond with the Secretary of the Treasury, satisfactory to the Secretary, indemnifying the Government in double the amount of the face value of the bonds. I think there can be no objection to the bill. We pass bills of such a character with that provision attached right along.

Mr. KING. For my own information, I would like to inquire of the Senator whether there is any possibility of those certificates being negotiated and getting into the hands of innocent purchasers and being presented to the Government later on by such innocent holders.

Mr. NEW. The Government can certainly sustain no loss, because the Government is indemnified by a bond in double the amount of the face of the certificates. They are supposed to have been stolen. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER], was referred to me as a subcommittee of the Committee on Claims, and with that provision in it I reported the bill favorably.

Mr. KING. Are the certificates negotiable? Would they pass current as money?

Mr. NEW. They were dated July 15, 1920, and one was due January 15, 1921, and the others due March 15, 1921. I think there is no possibility of the United States suffering any loss. That is amply provided against.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT STREET RAILWAYS.

The bill (S. 985) to amend the provisions of an act relating to certain railway corporations owning or operating street railways in the District of Columbia, approved June 5, 1920, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

PUBLIC-BUILDING CONTRACTORS AND SUBCONTRACTORS.

The bill (S. 1905) providing for the relief of certain contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 12, after the word "but," to insert "in response to such invitation were," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limitation contained in the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes," approved August 25, 1919, that "no claims for such reimbursement shall be paid unless filed with the Treasury Department within three months after the passage of this act," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to consider and act upon any claims filed under said act of Congress which were received in the Treasury Department on or before December 5, 1919.

SEC. 2. That the aforesaid act of August 25, 1919, shall be held to include all contracts for the construction, improvement, special repair, equipment, and furnishing of post offices and other public buildings specified in said act, including the United States courthouse in the District of Columbia, the bids for which were invited prior to April 6, 1917, but in response to such invitation were not opened until subsequent to that date, and on which said bids contracts were awarded, and as to such contracts claims for reimbursement, as provided by said act of August 25, 1919, as amended by the act of March 6, 1920, may be filed within three months after the passage of this act: Provided, That the claim of no subcontractor shall be allowed and paid under the provision of this section unless it is established by satisfactory proof that his subbid, as subsequently accepted, was submitted to the contractor on any of the work above referred to prior to the submission of the Government contractors' bid to the proper governmental authority.

SEC. 3. That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to expedite the examinatioin and payment of claims filed under the provisions of the aforesaid act of August 25, 1919, as amended, he is hereby authorized, in his discretion, from and after the passage of this act and until June 30, 1922, to detail from the field force of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury such number of superintendents of construction and others as he may deem necessary, and for such period as he may consider proper, to serve in the Office of the Supervising Architect, exclusively to aid in the examination and settlement of said claims.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not object to the consideration of this bill, because I was not sufficiently advised as to its terms and limitations and implications. It seems to me, after having heard the bill read, that it imposes penalties upon the Government and may subject the Government to the payment of very large sums. Moreover, if the Government is to afford relief to every contractor who during the war had contracts with the Government, and because of the rise in materials or in wages failed to make the profits anticipated or possibly incurred losses—if the Government is to meet all those obligations, or is to expose itself to the payment of those claims, it is a matter which ought to receive the serious consideration of Congress.

The Senator from Maine, who reported the bill, knows that during the war contracts were entered into between individuals and between individuals and the Government, under which private individuals were to do certain work for individuals and to do certain work for the Government. Because of the mounting prices, in many instances losses were sustained, and in many instances no profits were made.

Is this legislation for the purpose of reimbursing all who had not provided for the contingency of rising prices, and therefore failed to make profits or sustained losses? If that is the purpose of this measure, where are you going to draw the line, because, as the Senator knows, there were thousands of contracts entered into, involving perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars, and if those contracts were lived up to and were based upon prewar prices there would be very great losses, and the Government, if it sets this precedent here now, may be called upon to pay very large sums.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator from Maine enters into any elaborate reply I desire to interpose an objection to the consideration of the bill at this time. It apparently removes the bar of the statute of limitation. The only information the report gives us is that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds thinks there is good reason to remove the bar, and that is all.

I myself am unable to understand why the bill should not have gone to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Claims is charged with the duty of inquiring into claims for compensation alleged to be due from the United States.

Mr. FERNALD. If the Senator will withhold his objection, I think I can make a statement which will clear the situation entirely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am entirely willing to withhold the objection.

Mr. FERNALD. On August 25, 1919, a bill passed both Houses and became a law, permitting contractors to present their claims to the Treasury of the United States, where they had been interfered with by priority orders, their material taken, and their men taken from them by the Army and Navy.

There were 347 such contracts for the building of post office and other Federal buildings in the United States. Under that law there have been 96 adjustments. Sixty-one claims have been rejected entirely, and there are now 65 which are being adjusted.

This bill does three things. Under the law the contractors were obliged to file their claims within three months after its passage, which was November 25, 1919.

There were 10 claims which were not received in the department by that date, and 10 only, on account of sickness—I think, one case of insanity—and in some cases small contractors who were not notified and did not know of the passage of the act.

First, the bill takes care of those 10 contractors. The amount is very small. That is the first provision in the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator not tell us what the amount is in the cases of those claims?

Mr. FERNALD. The estimated amount to cover all the claims was $2,750,000. An appropriation was made of $2,000,000, and but $1,532,953.97 has been paid.

The bill first takes care of those 10 men. Then there were 15 contractors who made their bids prior to April 6, 1917, and the bids were not opened by the Treasury Department until after April 6, 1917. There are 15 of those contractors, and that is all that is contemplated and taken care of in this measure. As I stated, the estimate was for $2,750,000, the appropriation was $2,000,000, and we have not come anywhere near the amount estimated.

The third provision is a most fair and just measure. It authorizes the Secretary to detail from the field force of the Supervising Architect such number of superintendents of construction and others as he thinks necessary to aid in the examination and settlement of the claims. Many of the claims that are unsettled at this time are unsettled because of a lack of clerical force. It is not suggested that any new men be hired in the department, but that the Secretary may have authority to call in some of those who are outside to help adjust the claims.

A similar bill had the approval of former Secretary McAdoo, and I have his letter here. It also had the approval of former Secretary of the Treasury Glass, and the pending bill has the approval of the present Secretary of the Treasury. I have a letter from him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I should like unanimous consent to complete my statement, if it is satisfactory to the Senator from Montana and if he would be willing to withdraw his objection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not feel disposed to do that until I have some kind of information as to the facts upon which we are asked to waive a perfectly valid defense of the statute.

Mr. FERNALD. I thought I was making it quite clear.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will understand that I offer no objection whatever to the general principle of the bill. Of course, the Government of the United States ought to respond in damages to those who were injured by reason of the priority orders. The principle I admit, but apparently some of the claimants did not make their claims in time, and it is now proposed that the Government shall waive a defense of the statute against those claims without any reason being assigned, so far as the report goes, to show what the facts are upon which we are asked to act.

Mr. FERNALD. I do not know whether the Senator from Montana still objects or whether he will permit me to complete my statement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should be very glad to join in giving unanimous consent to allow the Senator to complete his statement, but until the RECORD shows some facts upon which we may act I shall have to insist upon my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine does not require unanimous consent to go on with his statement. He is speaking now upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the unfinished business, the so-called coal bill.

Mr. FERNALD. Then, I think I shall complete my statement. Most of the bills on the calendar to-day have been passed over, but I believe this is a very urgent measure.

The bill, as I said, provides, first, that those men who did not file their claims within three months may have an opportunity to file them. Those men were 10 days behind the date mentioned in the act that was passed. That is one reason. It seems to me only fair that they should have that opportunity. That is the first provision.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand that these contracts come within the spirit of the law which Congress passed a few years ago and to which the Senator from Maine referred?

Mr. FERNALD. They do.

Mr. POMERENE. And the claimants can not get the compensation asked for because of the technical objections to which the Senator refers?

Mr. FERNALD. Precisely; that is true. Some of them were small contractors who never heard of any legislation. There are only 10 of them. That is the first provision.

The second provision covers 15 contracts for the construction of Federal buildings, which were to be built on proposals for which bids were invited prior to April 6, but not opened until after that date. Those 15 men made their bids, mailed them to the Secretary, but the bids were not opened until after April 6. The bill provides that they shall have an opportunity to be heard.

The third provision simply authorizes the Secretary to detail from the field force of the Supervising Architect such number of superintendents of construction and others as he may think necessary to aid in examination and settlement of the claims. As I have said, there are 65 claims now in various stages of adjustment and on account of a lack of clerical force they are unable to make any adjustment of the claims. The bill provides that they may call on these men for that purpose only.

As I said, the bill had the approval of Mr. McAdoo, later of Mr. Glass, and now it has been approved by the present Secretary of the Treasury. The matter was taken up by the full Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House and had the approval of the entire committee in a unanimous report, and the same is true as to the Senate committee. It seems to me that the men ought to be taken care of at this time.

It would seem, in case the pending legislation were enacted, that $250,000 additional might be required in this connection—that is, if all the bills were allowed, but many of the bills have not been allowed. Some allowances have been for one-quarter or one-half the amount claimed; but by the bill the matter is simply taken to the Secretary of the Treasury and there, unless the claim is just, it is turned down entirely. It does seem to me that the men ought to be settled with at this late date. I hope the Senator from Montana will withdraw his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate, and the pending question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere in any way with the bill that has been discussed by the Senator from Maine. I have a very sympathetic feeling with the purposes of the bill to relieve some of those people, but as the morning hour has passed and the unfinished business is before the Senate I wish to say a few words about the bill that we have under consideration.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I think it is very important that the Senator from Alabama should be heard by more Senators than are present at this time. For that reason, if he will permit, I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. STANLEY. Very well; I defer to the Senator's wish.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the Senator, but I would really prefer to speak to those here rather than to call in those who are absent.

PORT OF NEW YORK AUTHORITY.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have been waiting patiently to try to secure action on Calendar No. 174, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 63) granting consent of Congress to the States of New York and New Jersey to enter into the agreement for the establishment of "The port of New York authority," which would have been reached in a very few moments if the unfinished business had not been laid before the Senate. It is a measure to which I am quite sure there can be no objection. I wonder if the Senator from Alabama would object if I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this particular matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. It is a joint resolution providing for agreement between the States of New York and New Jersey to enter into an understanding about the development of the port of New York. The two States have appropriated millions of dollars, and it is purely a formal matter on the part of Congress. They can not move until this formality is gone through with and they are given this regular technical authority.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator will move to take up the joint resolution, to vote with him to displace the unfinished business now before the Senate, but I am sure the proposition the Senator has in mind will cause debate, and I think we ought to go on with the unfinished business if we are to consider it.

Mr. EDGE. I was simply going to ask unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business, in order that this matter might be considered. I can not imagine that any debate will be brought about by its consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I assure the Senator I shall be through in a few minutes, and I am sure he will be just as willing to wait on me as I am to wait on him.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on the 25th instant the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 78. An act authorizing the appointment of an additional judge for the district of North Dakota;

S. 694. An act providing for the appointment of an additional district judge for the southern judicial district of the State of West Virginia; and

S. J. Res. 34. Joint resolution creating a commission to represent the United States in the celebration of the first centennial of the proclamation of the independence of the Republic of Peru.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION AT RIO DE JANEIRO, BRAZIL (S. DOC. NO. 41).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and with the accompanying report referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a report from the Secretary of State concerning the desirability of the Government of the United States participating in an International Centennial Exposition which is to open in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on September 7, 1922.

To the recommendations of this report, I give my hearty approval. I trust the Congress will view the matter favorably and will make timely provisions to enable the United States suitably to participate in the exposition.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 27, 1921.

SEASONAL RATES ON COAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, in the last campaign one of the battle cries of the Republican Party was to take the Government out of business, and, although there was no particular basis on which to rest that battle cry, because, where the Government at that time had been functioning in business, it had been doing so under war necessities and not upon a peace basis, yet I have no doubt that it was a very popular battle cry and that numerous votes were annexed to the Republican column because it was believed that the leaders of the Republican Party were going to do something to alter war conditions, unshackle business, and give it a chance to swim out. Of course, the Republican Party was in control of both branches of Congress at that time, and I suppose the voting population of the country visualized that something else might happen if a Republican President was put in office. As I said, it was a popular battle cry.

If there is one precept handed down from the time of the fathers that commands the confidence and respect and approval of the great American people, it is the saying of Thomas Jefferson that that country which governs least governs best. Therefore this assumed battle cry of the Republican Party was annexing to itself the principles of Thomas Jefferson, and holding out to the American people that the shackles of interference by the Government with business would be removed if they once came into power. Yet they have been in power for a few months, and the principal business that seems to have come before Congress since they have been returned to power is putting politics back into business and not taking it out. This is one of the bills of that character, although it is not so bad as others, for, in my judgment, there is a worse bill to follow and some worse ones have preceded it. There is much that may be said in advocacy of the bill; but, nevertheless, it is one of that class of bills that those who think along Republican lines always nestle to their hearts. It is founded on the idea of using the power of the Government to help one man at the expense of others, being somewhat parallel to the doctrine of a high protective tariff, a tariff of prohibition of imports, which is levied in order that one man may grow fat behind the wall at the expense of his fellows, with the sheltering arm of the Government to protect him. This bill is one of that character. It is to foster one industry at the expense of others. Therefore I object to it.

There are provisions of interest in the bill; provisions that might meet with our approval. I listened to the argument of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who has the bill in charge. I have examined his diagrams, which are hung about the walls of this Chamber, in order to demonstrate that coal mining is a seasonal industry; that there is more demand in the wintertime for coal and more of it mined and shipped at that season than in the summer time, and that it would be the part of wisdom to encourage the mining and shipping of coal in the summer time and thereby relieve the pressure in the wintertime. So far so good; there is no objection to that part of his argument or to that proposal; but the Senator from New Jersey, who properly desires, if he can, to take care of those who buy coal in New Jersey and who do not produce it, is overlooking the fact that the coal business is not the only seasonal business in the United States. Of course, some businesses are fortunate enough to have a steady flow of production and consumption throughout the year, and therefore the varying seasons do not seriously affect them; but when it comes to agriculture—which is a larger industry than is coal mining—it is an entirely seasonal business. If the Senator from New Jersey would introduce a bill here designed to give Government aid at the expense of his constituents to enable the farmers of Alabama to extend the time of sale and distribution of their cotton crop through 12 months instead of through 3 months, and to carry their crops over during that period, I am sure if he could secure the passage of such legislation he would do great benefit to the farmers of the South; for one of the disastrous conditions that confront them is that they do a seasonal business; that they must reap their crops and market and distribute them within two or three months, thereby glutting the market whilst their crops are coming in, when the market is not ready to absorb them all at one time.

If it were necessary I might go on to illustrate the point by citing business after business in the United States which have this seasonal difficulty to meet. The fact that the business is seasonal, that it does not run evenly all through the year, affects those who are engaged in it; it affects their sales; it is injurious to them; but I do not think the strong arm of the Government is going to be used in order to relieve them. I would have no objection to the Senator from New Jersey relieving the coal business if it could be done without injury to others.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama his view in reference to the particular phase of the bill which I shall now quote. The bill provides that:

> The commission is hereby authorized to initiate, establish, approve, or adjust rates for the transportation of coal during specified seasons.

The question I wish to ask the Senator is this: If rates are made less in the spring of the year, of course, the people of the country who are able to afford it may buy their coal at the reduced prices; but will not the commission increase the rates in the following winter when the coal actually moves, when everybody is obliged to have it, and will it not make the cost of the coal just that much greater to those who are least able to bear the increased prices?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it manifestly will, and that is one of my objections to the bill; but I was just coming to that point in my argument.

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad to have had the interruption.

As I was proceeding to say, I should have no objection to relieving the seasonal condition in the coal industry if it could be done without putting the burden and the injury on somebody else, although I do not believe much in that class of legislation; but this bill, in order that the coal mines may operate with the same degree of steadiness in the summer that they do in the winter, proposes to pass the burden on to somebody else and to make somebody else pay for it.

One difficulty in the coal business—and it is a very serious difficulty and possibly one that can not be avoided—is that neither the great producers of coal nor the great consumers of coal have storage facilities in any degree commensurate with the productive capacity of the industry. The railroads, which are great consumers of coal, have very few bins or places for storage, and if they store coal at all it is mostly in their open cars. The great industries have but small capacity for storage in proportion to their needs, and it is difficult for them to carry over the coal from one season to another. Of course, I understand the purpose of this bill is to encourage the consumer, where he can do so and is able to do so, to develop storage facilities to take care of the summer production of coal. So far as the miner is concerned, of course, I recognize that, in a way, the plan proposed would be helpful to him, because when there is no car at the tipple the miner can not mine coal, there being no place to dump it when it comes from the mine to the top of the earth. That, however, is rather an objection that might be raised against the manner of doing business than against the particular time when the consumer seeks to buy coal.

The Senator gives us very excellent illustrations of the fact that a great deal more coal is produced in proportion to consumption in the winter than in the summer time. I am not going into that especially, because, in the main, it is true. Of course, some of the vital years that are shown on the chart are war years. The year of greatest discrepancy is the year 1918, when, practically by Government action, everybody who wanted the coal was ordered—for a request amounted to an order then—to buy their coal in the summer so as not to interfere with the winter business. Of course, a year of that kind is not a normal year on which to base any argument; but, in the main, the statements and facts set forth in the charts are true, that there is more coal proportionately mined in the wintertime when the demand is greater than in the summer time.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. The sale of anthracite coal was stabilized by a flat reduction of 50 cents a ton during certain months in which there was a reduced production and a reduced demand. While that concession no longer exists, the habit was acquired and the sale of anthracite coal is stable even yet. A reduction in the rate to the Great Lakes of 28 cents a ton restored a traffic of 20,000,000 tons of coal that had been going by the all-rail haul in other directions. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the propriety of so amending this bill as to repose in the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to make such reductions as it deems advisable in order to stimulate the production and movement of coal at certain seasons. If the bill after amendment should not do that there would be no harm to the consumer and I believe there would be the probability of getting what good there is in the bill out of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I am heartily in favor of his amendment, and I think it greatly improves the bill, but I have some other objections to the bill which the amendment does not meet.

As I understand the Senator's amendment, it goes to this proposition and I think he is right about it. A part of this bill reads as follows:

> (19) In order to promote continuous operation of coal mines, steady employment of coal miners, and economical use of facilities for distribution of coal, the commission is hereby authorized to initiate, establish, approve, or adjust rates for the transportation of coal during specified seasons or periods which shall be greater or less than the rates for other specified seasons or periods but which in the judgment of the commission will yield as nearly as may be the same annual revenue for like movement as rates without seasonal variation, to be maintained by carriers as a whole or as a whole in each of such coal rate groups or territories as the commission may from time to time designate for that purpose, or by such carrier or carriers as the commission may designate.

That provision is filled with dynamite to industry. Before coming to the point raised by the Senator from Kentucky, this bill contemplates that the commission may divide the country into "coal-rate groups," and that then a seasonal rate may be provided in one group without providing a seasonal rate in another group.

I will illustrate. New Orleans is a competitive point, by reason of transportation on the Mississippi River, between the coal fields of Kentucky and Illinois and the coal fields of Alabama. It is often in close competition. You put it in the power of the commission in this bill to say, if they want to do so, either that the New Orleans market shall be entirely monopolized when the seasonal rate is on by the coals of Kentucky and Illinois, or, on the other hand, that the coal fields of Alabama shall have the monopoly, because in the sale of coal as a general rule the freight rate amounts to more than the price of the coal at the mines, and coal can go into competing territory only to the extent that the coal rates equalize each other, or a little farther, and there it has to stop; and where you get a competitive territory that the coal from different districts goes into, if you adopted the seasonal rate for one and did not adopt it for the other, you would exclude from that market the coal from the other coal field.

You may say that the commission will not do it. I will not underwrite that they will not do it. I have seen these gentlemen that run business from Washington do far more remarkable things than that, and do them unwittingly. We have had a trial of this method of running the coal business—of a commission in Washington dipping into the business of people in the distribution of coal—and I can give you an illustration that came to my personal knowledge of how things often go awry because the man sitting in a swivel chair at a roll-top desk here in Washington can not see beyond yonder range of mountains and know what business is doing on the other side of them.

During the war there was a gentleman in my home city who was engaged in the sand business, and about 97 per cent of his sand was dug to furnish to the furnaces and the pipe factories to cast their iron in. One day I got a telegram from him saying that the coal commissioner, the director general of coal of the United States, had taken him off a certain list, and that although he had a contract with the coal mines to furnish him coal he could not get any. He had one of these steam shovels; he did not need more than about 10 tons of coal a month, but he had to have that to supply a large number of furnaces, and he said that the Washington authorities had ordered that he should not have any more coal. He asked me to go down and see what was the matter.

I called on the power that was and he said he was very sorry, but the policy of the Government was to build no more houses during the war, and that as sand was used only for the building of houses my constituent would have to be deprived of the use of coal in digging his sand. I asked him if he had ever looked into the file of papers. He admitted that he had not. Then I opened them, and when I opened the papers and laid the facts before him there were letters and telegrams from these furnace companies saying that they could not cast iron without sand in which to cast it, and that this man's business was to furnish sand for casting iron; and then this gentleman very kindly reversed his order, because it was not prohibited to make pig iron—in fact, pig iron was needed during the war—and authorized this gentleman, a man of small means, to proceed with his business and get about 10 tons of coal a month with which to dig sand.

That was not all. It ran along for about three months, and a new gentleman in charge of this bureau for distributing coal came into office, and he was ordered to economize in coal, of course, and like a good servant he proceeded to do so, not with an overdegree of intelligence, because he also failed to read his files; and he had not been in office many days when I got another telegram from my Birmingham constituent saying that they would not furnish him any more coal, and he had been taken off the list. So I went down to see the next man, and he told me he had sent for the file and had looked at the outside cover, and said that he was sorry, but the policy of the Government was against building houses during the war and he could not allow my constituent to have the 10 tons of coal a month with which to dig his sand. I asked him to look into the file, and when he read the papers in the file and saw that the sand was to aid in the making of pig iron instead of building houses he reversed his order and gave the man the coal, and it ran along the next time for about six months.

Then they got another man down there who was going to sweep clean as a new broom and save coal, and out came another order saying that this man in Alabama could no longer dig sand, cutting him off from his coal supply. He wired me, and I went back to see the next new man, and he had read the outside of the file saying that this 10 tons of coal was going for digging sand, and never opened it. I again asked him kindly to open his file and read it, and when he discovered that the sand was to make pig iron and not to build houses he reversed the order, and the gentleman in Alabama was allowed again to receive his 10 tons a month; but I said to this man when I left: "My friend, this is the third time I have been here. I do not know how long this war is going to last. Would you object to pasting a piece of paper on the outside of the file saying that this coal is used to dig sand, and the sand makes pig iron, and does not build houses, so that your immediate successor may know what is in the file without going through the pains and the difficulty of unstrapping the band and looking inside?"

That may seem like an exaggerated case, although it is an actual one, and it was one of those necessities that grew out of war; but I am tired of war, and I hope you are.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. While the Senator is indulging in unpleasant memories, may I be permitted to give him one from actual experience?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be delighted to have the Senator do so.

Mr. POMERENE. A manufacturer in Cincinnati whose product was in part wood was required to have a certain amount of coal each month, but from the refuse of his woodworking department he got more than half of his fuel. He had a sprinkling system for fire protection, and under this order he was not permitted to use any coal for fuel. Therefore his plant, which employed 300 men, was shut down and he was obliged then to get coal in order to preserve his sprinkling system from freezing, and as a result it took more coal to preserve the sprinkling system than it would have taken to operate the entire plant and give employment to 300 men.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly; and even that was near at home to the then director general, where he might not have had to look over the mountains and see what was happening. But, Mr. President, with these occurrences during the war, which the people very patriotically and generously accepted because their boys were on the battle fields, it was because of these things, when a great political party placed on its banners the battle cry, "We are in favor of taking politics out of business," that a good many of these people rallied to their flag. Here they are back, putting politics into business just as fast as the legislative machine can grind it out; and, as I say, here is a proposition that you are to put into the hands of a commission here in Washington, that does not know anything about it, the power to make a seasonal rate in one district and to withhold it in another district of business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator claim that the Interstate Commerce Commission know nothing about the coal business or the rates affecting it? They have just made a seasonal rate for the Lake transportation of coal.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will come to the Interstate Commerce Commission about this business in a minute. Of course, they are very delightful gentlemen, but they do not know it all, any more than the gentleman that sat down here on B Street during the war and insisted that coal should not be used for digging sand because he had never heard of its being used for casting iron.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. REED. I have a distinct recollection of some hearings recently had in which it appeared that the chief cause of the coal shortage was a lack of cars, and it further appeared that that shortage had been accentuated by orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission sending cars that ought to have been at coal mines out into different parts of the country in different work.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is right, and I am coming to that. The Senator from New Jersey has not gone to the bottom of this. The gentlemen who furnished him these beautiful pictures that hang around the wall so entranced his vision that he has not been able to see behind them; but there is something behind this proposition that I want him to see, and I am glad he is here.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the Senator is unfair in that. I have tried to study the question for two years, and I believe I am right in this measure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator recognizes, according to his own language, that this seasonal rate can be put into effect either in the country at large or in districts. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Why, yes; certainly it is correct, because there is a winter market in certain places and a summer market in other places.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then in a competing market, where there are two competing districts, it is entirely possible, if not probable, that this commission may give the seasonal rate to one and withhold it from the other, cut out competition, and drive one coal field out of business or out of the business of that market.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I can not accept that statement, because I do not believe that is what the commission would do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know; I do not say they would do it intentionally; but I will show the Senator before I get through that they have done a great many things, as to which I do not charge them with any bad motives, that are equally foolish.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the line of the Senator's thought——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. REED. The fact is that in many markets in the country coal from five or six different fields meets; it comes from distant parts of the country, and if seasonal rates were made for a certain group of mines it would operate to the disadvantage of the four or five or six other points of production. I do not know of a market in the United States of any importance where the coal is not supplied from a number of districts, some of it being hauled for hundreds of miles.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is undoubtedly correct. Now I will come to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], which is not only based on common sense and common reason but is based on abstract justice. I am not one of those who indulges in the cry of "Down with the rich and up with the poor." But the man is not worth much whose heart does not feel a sympathetic beat for the man who in dead of winter has to buy his coal by the scuttleful or the half ton in order that his family may not freeze or starve; and here is a bill reported by one of the great committees of the Senate—a committee of which I am a member myself, though I did not join in reporting the bill, a bill brought in and vouched for by one of the great committees of the Senate—which on its face proposes to give to him that hath and to take away from him that hath not. It proposes to give to the great consumer of coal, the man who has storage facilities, the man who buys over a hundred tons of coal, buys it by the carload lots, cheap rates in the summer, and then force the Interstate Commerce Commission to charge the old rate in the winter, but to add on to the winter rate the reduction made in the summer for the benefit of the great consumer, the manufacturer, or the proprietor of the great hotel.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I know the Senator does not want to be unfair in his argument against this bill. It is quite true that some domestic consumers probably would pay an increased price, say 25 cents a ton, should they buy their coal in the winter, when under this scheme the rate is higher. But suppose the domestic consumer was in the market for 10 tons a year, which is a fair average, the increase for his whole 10 tons would be only $2.50. The object of this bill is not to save money for the domestic consumer in the summer and penalize him in the winter; the object of the bill is to stimulate the purchase of coal during the summer, to take from the peak load of 21,000,000 tons now carried by the railroads in the winter, which causes a scarcity of cars and results in transportation difficulties, and distribute it in the summer time, and avoid scarcity prices, when coal runs to $28 a ton. Is it not worth while to penalize 25 cents in order to save the scarcity prices to the domestic consumer of $5, $10, and even $15 plus in the wintertime? I think the Senator is unfair.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator not allow me to answer the Senator from New Jersey first and then I will be glad to yield?

Of course, I expected the answer of the Senator from New Jersey to what I said. The Senator engages in big things, in big business, with big men. Two dollars and fifty cents would not be much for a man who bought 1,000 tons, to run a great hotel, or to run a manufacturing plant, to keep a ship or a yacht in steam; but $2.50 in the middle of winter to the man who earns his bread in the sweat of his face may mean something, and it is likely to mean more under this Republican rule, with bread lines and soup houses, than it has in the past. It may be very little, but it is not just. That is what I say.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator consent to a further interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think the Senator meets my argument. I am not making a political speech or a reply to his political speech or his attack on the Republican Party or the administration at the present time. I point to the fact that this bill was before the Congress during the former administration, and it is a sincere effort to avoid the condition which caused so much suffering last year and the year before.

The Senator might object to it, might be against it, but when he says that putting $2.50 a ton on the man who purchases 10 tons means nothing to me, and sneeringly refers to the fact that I am in big business, he is very unfair in his argument, because the point I am making, which he does not answer, is that this seasonal freight rate is an inducement to prevent that domestic consumer from paying $25 or even $50 more for his coal, by reason of the equalizing of the unbalanced load between summer and winter. That is the point I am making.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is entirely wrong if he thinks that I was sneering at his position in life, for I was not. I rejoice with the Senator. I merely think the Senator does not see the other side of the question, that is all. I do not think he sees the position of the not one man but the millions who are going to be penalized by this bill, by the Interstate Commerce Commission being required to raise the rate on them, and make them pay it to the extent that it has lowered it on the others.

It may be but very little to each one of these modest coal consumers, and it may save a vast deal to the great consumers of coal in the great markets, but I say a bill which carries that provision in its belly is not just, it is not equitable, and it is not right, and that is why I object to it.

Now I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. There is no difference, after all, between the statement made by the Senator from Alabama and the admission made by the Senator from New Jersey as to the effect of this bill upon the very consumers the Senator from Alabama is talking about. I wish to call attention to the colloquy between the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], with reference to this matter, when the Senator from New Jersey was addressing the Senate. The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] said:

> I understand that the purpose of the Senator, as he has said, is to even off the black lines shown on the chart, and he proposes to do that by giving the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to grant a lower rate for the transportation of coal in the summer time, so as to increase the production and the storage of coal in that period. Would not that have this effect, then, that those who can store coal, the large consumers—the railroads, for example, and other large industries which have facilities for storing coal—would get the benefit of the lower rates and the larger production, if the Senator's idea is carried out; but the small consumer, who can not store coal, would have the disadvantage of the relatively higher rates in the wintertime? Would it not have that effect?

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] answered, "Not to any great extent," and explained the extent, adding this characteristic admission:

> It would to some extent increase the price.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly, and although I think it would be very much greater than the Senator from New Jersey indicates, that would be the burden thrown on the American people by reason of the passage of this bill. Yet, assuming what he says to be true, that it is slight, it is unjust to say that these people who must buy coal in the winter because they have no storage facilities, who must buy coal in the winter because they have no bank accounts, who must buy coal in the winter because they only have sufficient out of the daily wage to buy from time to time, because they must buy coal in the winter must have a burden put on them in order that the great consumer of coal may buy his coal cheaper in the summer time. That is not just.

I am not making a political speech. I am discussing a bill which the Senator says was pending before the Congress in the last administration, and evidently a Democratic administration would not pass it, and it has now come to a Republican administration, and this Republican administration proposes to pass it.

No; the Senator is mistaken; I am not making a political speech. I have sat in silence for over three months, hoping that the Republican Party might do something to pull this country out of the slough of despond. I have sat here trying to be helpful, not hurtful, in its efforts, and I have said nothing about it to-day, because you are entitled to your chance. If the time comes when a political speech will be justified, after you have had your fair chance to save the country, I can assure the Senator from New Jersey he will hear one; but he will hear a real one, and not a discussion of a bill.

But you have brought this bill before the Senate—an unjust bill. The Republican Party is sponsoring this bill. My speech is not a political speech. I am criticizing the sponsorship of the bill which is at the bar of the Senate.

I am not going to take the Senator's time much longer, but I have one other thing to point out. I have indicated how this bill discriminates; but I want you to bear in mind that this bill does another thing besides discriminating. It gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to commandeer the cars of the country for the movement of coal, to prefer one industry to another, to take away the cars from one industry and give them to another, putting that industry out of business, and take them from one consuming part of the country and give them to another.

I got into that trap once before without knowing what I was doing; and I think there is an old saying that the first time a man fools you it is his fault and the second time he fools you it is your fault; and I do not propose to be fooled upon this question of discrimination a second time.

In a bill passed about a year ago, known as the Cummins Act, on page 22, section 402, this provision is contained:

> It shall also be the duty of every carrier by railroad to make just and reasonable distribution of cars for transportation of coal among the coal mines served by it, whether located upon its line or lines or customarily dependent upon it for car supply. During any period when the supply of cars available for such service does not equal the requirements of such mines it shall be the duty of the carrier to maintain and apply just and reasonable ratings of such mines and to count each and every car furnished to or used by any such mine for transportation of coal against the mine. Failure or refusal so to do shall be unlawful, and in respect of each car not so counted shall be deemed a separate offense.

And so forth.

Then they also put in the bill, on page 23, under subsection 15, the following:

> To give directions for preference or priority in transportation, embargoes, or movement of traffic under permits at such time and for such periods as it may determine, and to modify, change, suspend, or annul them.

When those provisions were put in the bill it looked like they were put in there for the purpose of preventing freight jams, to encourage the movement of cars and freight, to facilitate the movement of coal where it was most badly needed. That was the way it looked to me. But the law had not been on the statute books a year before certain gentlemen came to the Interstate Commerce Commission and said there was a great shortage of coal in their country, and that they would freeze during the winter if it was not made up, although they had never frozen any other winter. They wanted certain coal diverted. The Interstate Commerce Commission fell for it and issued an order commandeering all the open cars in the United States for the coal business, and they quickly supplied the needs of the particular neighborhood which wanted a supply of coal for the winter.

Then there was a great demand for coal for foreign ships, and they allowed open freight cars to be loaded for that purpose. Of course, it is understood that coal can not be loaded in box cars except at great expense. The only cars in which they can possibly handle coal are open dump cars. They loaded those cars and allowed them to be carried to the ports; and because the ships did not come in to unload the coal they allowed the cars to remain there indefinitely, using the cars for storage purposes, and taking the coal that the American people were badly in need of, and maintaining a high price for coal during that entire winter because of this order.

That was not all. There are a good many other businesses that need open freight cars. People engaged in other work, especially in the shipment of lumber for house building, of bricks and other building materials of all kinds, or materials for use in road building, slag, cement, or gravel must have open cars for that purpose. The result was that the order went so far that they took all the available open cars in the United States and diverted them to the ports practically as a storage place for the men who could export coal during that year at a very much higher figure than they could sell it for in the American market, and to such an extent businesses in my own community that I know of were absolutely shut down and men turned out of employment because they could not get open cars to move their raw materials to their places of business or to move their finished products away.

Now, in addition to what they already have on the law books to encourage this procedure, they are going to put a premium on doing so by changing the freight rate.

I have never found the day when the battle cries and the maxims of the Republican Party appealed to me much. The battle cry in the last campaign of taking Government out of business was an alluring one, but for myself I am willing to stand on the Jeffersonian principle that that government which governs least governs best, and there is no reason at this time for the Government of the United States dipping its hands any further into private business. Therefore I am opposed to the passage of the bill.

THE GENERAL FINANCIAL SITUATION.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, yesterday morning's Washington Post contained an editorial with the heading "Financing the loans." The article proceeded to discuss a question which is now virtually pending before the Senate as to giving to the President and Secretary of the Treasury broad power over the foreign loans made by the preceding administration during the war.

I wish to read one paragraph of the editorial. After alluding to the fact that the present Senate seemed reluctant to give the Secretary that unlimited power over foreign loans, after alluding to the fact that the Senate seems to be suspicious of this administration, the editorial proceeds:

> This expression of doubt and suspicion is in marked contrast to the attitude that Congress assumed toward the last administration during the progress of the war. Then vast sums were voted in the twinkling of an eye for the national defense, and placed in the hands of executive officers to expend according to their judgment in the public interest. The President of the United States was voted $100,000,000 with which to do as he liked, Congress placing implicit confidence in his judgment and integrity; billions were placed at the disposal of Cabinet officers; more billions were granted the Shipping Board for the building of a merchant marine, and through it all no sinister doubts assailed the patriotic men who controlled the Nation's purse strings.

The situation in which the Congress placed the stupendous power in the hands of the Democratic administration was totally different from that which now exists when similar powers are asked for. The Washington Post, indefatigable in its upholding of the present administration, wants to know why it is that the Congress now has doubt, now has suspicion, now hesitates about placing in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury these unlimited powers over such almost infinite sums of money.

It is difficult, in language entirely parliamentary, to say why the Senate is becoming doubtful and suspicious. Very briefly I will state some of those reasons.

We were told that as soon as the new administration came in—and that was one of the promises which brought them in—we would call our soldiers home from the Rhine and stop doing police duty for France, while France is using our money to extend her imperial domain in Africa and in Asia Minor. We were told that they would be brought home. We are now told that they do not want to come home. Who tells us so? The people who are keeping them over there. The soldiers are not heard; they can not be heard. However, I am slow to believe that an American citizen with the usual ties of family, friendship, and neighborhood is reluctant to come home from a far country when he was conscripted into that service and now has the opportunity to come.

The people were told, as a part of the inducement which drew the 7,000,000 majority vote to the Republican standard, that as soon as Congress could pass a peace resolution Mr. Harding would sign it. In the Senate, without loss of time, we passed a peace resolution. What has become of it? Where is it? What delays it? What magic wand of enchantment has been waved over it and paralyzed it? The people have seen what is going on and have seen what is not going on. They have seen week after week, month after month pass by, and the peace resolution hung up in the House. Who controls the House? Who has more authority over it than the House leader, Mr. MONDELL? Who is in closer touch with the President than the floor leader of the House? Who can exert more power over the other branch of the Congress if he chose to do it?

The people know that if the President said "Pass that resolution," it would pass. They believe that, directly or indirectly, Executive influence has kept the House of Representatives from echoing the views of the Senate. Therefore the people hold the President, they hold the House, they hold the Republican Members of this Chamber responsible for the delay of peace which has kept closed to us the markets of Germany and Austria, open only to those big exporters who can secure licenses to ship commodities to central Europe.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. STANLEY. Has the Senator seen a copy of a morning journal which is published here in Washington by a man who is alleged to be, at least, a very great man and who is very close to the President?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I glanced at the morning Herald, I will say to my friend from Kentucky, but I may not recall the article to which he refers.

Mr. STANLEY. There was a very interesting picture of an old lady playing hob with an automobile in a rocky road, formerly chauffeured by one Woodrow Wilson. The old lady has got the machine and the works fixed; and somebody has been blasphemous enough to put a plume in the old lady's hat and to dub it "Senatorial leadership."

I am a little surprised, however, that the Senator from Georgia would reflect, even inferentially, upon the President of the United States for the one good thing that he has done lately. If he has had anything to do with putting that infamous peace resolution to sleep, I will remember him in my prayers.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, after having heard the extremely eloquent speech which the Senator from Kentucky made against the Knox resolution, I am not at all surprised at his remarks.

There is another thing, Mr. President, that planked the chasm over for the Republican candidates as they crossed the ravine between failure and brilliant success, and that was disarmament. These prodigious outlays of the people's money for the building of battleships, the maintenance of armies, preparations for war, airplanes to kill from above and submarines to kill from below—all this was to be checked, and the President was, soon as possible, to put his tremendous influence back of a movement for disarmament.

We passed the Borah resolution. It seemed to us at first that there was great opposition to it from the other side, but all at once it was whispered around the corridors and to us here on "dynamite row" that the presidential opposition had suddenly been withdrawn, and that the Borah resolution would receive a unanimous vote on the other side. The incredible news at first staggered belief, but it was verified on the roll call. But where is the Borah resolution? We now have the floor leader of the other House saying that the Borah resolution amounts to nothing. The substance of what he said is carried in this headline:

Borah amendment not to tie Harding, asserts Mondell.

The floor leader, Mr. MONDELL, had been recently in conference with the President of the United States. Can Senators expect confidence to be built upon broken pledges? Did any private individual or any group of individuals or any Government or any party ever build a solid superstructure of trust upon the frail foundation of broken pledges? That is the situation before us.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know the Senator from Georgia wishes to do the really unwieldy majority in both the other Chamber and this full justice for all it has accomplished. We remember, of course, the very definite pledge for strict economy made by them, but I presume the Senator from Georgia has been unable to find where that has been as yet practiced. However, there is another thing the Senator will undoubtedly recall, for which they ought to be given credit, if any credit is due, and that is they did pass the emergency tariff bill.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes; but neither has it lifted anybody out of the emergency. I have not heard of it having done any good to anybody, and I will thank any Senator on the "unwieldy majority" side to indicate and specify the industry, the community, or the individual that has been benefited by the emergency tariff bill.

I will read another headline, Mr. President:

Hoover opposed to Federal aid to cotton men now.

Now is the time they need it. When are they to get it, if not now? Are they to get it next year or the next decade? Are they to get it when the farms have been made deserts, when the merchants have been closed out and the banks been thrown into insolvency?

You will find from the record, Senators, that between October and May last there were 10,000 failures in the United States, 7,000 more than during the corresponding period of the year previous.

Senators heard the statement which was made when a bill came before us to give two additional lifetime judges in order to relieve the congested dockets in New York. They heard the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], state that, partly on account of the increase in bankruptcy cases in New York, he believed they not only ought to have two new judges but that they should have four. The State of Georgia is in the same situation and wants one or two or three or four additional judges.

Mr. President, briefly I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to a bill which I introduced here some time ago to make Government bonds legal tender; in other words, to monetize the bonds. If that were done, immediate relief would be afforded. If it is not done bankruptcies will continue.

The Federal Reserve Board, Mr. President, is, financially speaking, the United States Government. It is not the national banks; it is not the saving banks; it is not the State banks, but it is the United States Government controlling its finances, and the Supreme Court of the United States is my authority for saying that the Federal reserve banks are waging war upon the State banks; and they are waging war upon the cotton growers of the South, and no doubt also upon the wheat, corn, and other grain growers of the West, as well as the live-stock producers of the country. I have here on my desk letters from cotton factors in the city nearest to my residence—37 miles away from my home—which indicate that those cotton factors are saying to the country banks who owe them and to the individuals who owe them, "You must pay up; you must pay up now." The pressure comes from the Federal reserve banks; in other words, from the Federal Government. The demand is, "Sell out the cotton now before the new crop comes in; sell it out, although it only brings 8 cents or 9 cents or 10 cents, when the cost was 30 cents a pound to produce it."

Think of it, Mr. President, the United States Government making war upon its own people, desolating its own industries; bringing havoc among legitimate business houses all over the Union, driving men to desperation, causing the loss of homes, the loss of jobs, filling the highways and the byways with an army of unemployed, and yet we have three and a quarter billion dollars of gold hoarded in the Treasury waiting for somebody to come and eat it or to drink it or to wear it! What is that gold reserve doing banked up, useless, in the Treasury?

During the Civil War the Union Government financed the armies of Sherman and Grant, of Sheridan and Thomas, with greenbacks that never had a gold dollar back of them. Immediately after the war the Government began to destroy those greenbacks, and the process continued until President Grant, in 1873, ordered it stopped, leaving only $346,000,000 undestroyed. In the panic which occurred at that time came "Black Friday," on which occasion there came about such a universal crash that it seemed that the whole industrial world was falling. Black Friday! I remember it, because that was the crash, the panic, in which my father lost the home that had been ours since our ancestors went forth from it to fight the battles of the Revolutionary War.

The first that this country ever knew of a gold reserve was when the then Secretary of the Treasury, the Hon. John Sherman, arbitrarily set aside $100,000,000 in gold to secure those greenbacks. They did not need security. Those $346,000,000 of greenbacks were based upon the credit of the Government, upon its power to tax every acre of land, every mule and horse, every herd of cattle, every stock of merchandise, every income in the land; they were based upon the innate strength that bears up the bonds of the Government. The bonds of the Government rest upon no better foundation than those Treasury notes. Secretary Sherman having established the gold reserve, Congress many years later legalized it and increased the amount to $150,000,000, taking that gold away from circulation, where it competed with the interest-bearing notes of the national banks. That is the only reason why the gold is hoarded in the Treasury—to give a free field, without competition, to the interest-bearing notes of national banks. Here are the Federal reserve banks—in other words, the United States Government—boasting of the fact that they made 100 per cent profit—out of whom? Out of the users of borrowed money East and West, North and South.

Senators, what business has the United States Government to make 100 per cent on the money that it supplies for filling the channels of trade and to keep up the struggles of industry? With the Government making 100 per cent upon those who have to borrow money, that profit will be compounded, more gold will be bought and retired from usefulness, another 100 per cent made and more gold bought and retired from usefulness, until this Government will own all of the available gold supply of the whole world. For what purpose?

We have been spending money here by the hundreds of millions preparing for war, and Secretary Weeks, in his speech last week, said that we ought not to hesitate; that we, the Cabinet, we, the men in power, know some secrets that we are not at liberty to disclose; we know the need for these big navies and big armies. If his words have any meaning at all, his statement amounts to this, that he knows that we are drifting into another war, and I ask you this: Which will be the more important to you as a preparation for another war, your battleship or the crew that mans it; your regiment or the men who hold the guns; the men in the ranks and in the uniforms or the countless millions who toil in shop and mill and mine and farm to feed and clothe those men while they are doing service for their country?

Talk about preparedness for war. What is a saner preparation than to maintain the confidence, the respect, the loyalty of the people? Because no matter how many battleships you build nor how often you increase your Army the real strength of any nation is in the strength of the arms of its men.

Who took these bonds and financed the war? Suppose you destroy their confidence; will they take the next issue of bonds? Here are the prospectuses issued by Secretary McAdoo. He said to the people: "Buy these bonds. Pay 100 per cent for them. Pay 2 per cent down." The hook was baited, if I may so say without disrespect, with the 2 per cent, which almost anybody could rake up. "Pay down your 2 per cent, and get hooked to a bond." The propaganda was made almost coercive. No man could refuse to pay his 2 per cent and preserve the respect of those who surrounded him, nor, indeed, his own self-respect. He had to buy them. Great blocks of those bonds were issued to the big banking houses and other big concerns throughout the Union. Did the directors and the presidents and the stockholders of those banks and those big factories and manufacturing companies and mining companies, and so forth, buy the bonds themselves? By no means, Mr. President. The word went down from the captain's office, and the assistants in the outer room had to buy. The stenographers had to buy. The typewriting girls and boys had to buy. The very elevator boys had to buy; and it may be said with moderation that in the history of the human race there never was such a universal subscription to the bonds issued by a Government. They pulled in everybody who could rake, scrape, borrow, or get in any other way the 2 per cent, sometimes by sacrifice of live stock, sometimes by a mortgage on the home, sometimes by making a note at the bank with personal security.

Mr. President, a Government ought to keep its word. Above all things, a Government ought to keep its word with the men who shed their blood for it. I heard discussed here the other day a soldiers' bonus bill. The land is full of destitute ex-service men, some of them in employment, tens of thousands of them seeking employment, some of them with food to eat and some with none, some of them with whole bodies and some with maimed bodies, some in the hospitals, some dying by the roadside, as pitiable a spectacle as this Republic ever did show; and we tell these starving, jobless men in the soldiers' bonus bill reported out by a Republican committee—and you have got to face the country on it, too, and you have got to do it next year—that, a year from now, they can get $50! What will they live on between now and next year, when they will get the $50? Do you want them to beg in the streets? The laws of Rome were once changed because a veteran of the legions, who had fought for his country in distant lands, bared his breast and showed the wounds he had received in following the eagles of Rome. The same sort of veterans followed the Stars and Stripes, the eagle of our country, and now they are neglected, suffering, dying, and the best that the Republican Party can promise them is that if they can live on blackberries or live on persimmons, and live on other natural products of the soil, or upon charity, for another year, they will get $50! There is statesmanship for you!

If some leader of the Republican Party—robust, clear-thinking, big-hearted—were to point to that three and a quarter billion dollars of gold and say, "We will take it and pay the soldiers' bounty out of it," then you would be doing something, and, for once, Wall Street would get a lesson. Money that is useless is money that need not exist. Money was made to circulate, and nature did not make it. From the time of Aristotle down to the time of Adam Smith, and to the political economists of our own country, you have heard that nature does not provide money, but that government and the law produce it.

What were the inducements held out by Secretary McAdoo when he sold these bonds? I have them here, page after page. Think of it! A Government bond below par! Why should it be, if the Government had not repudiated those bonds through the Federal reserve banks? That is what they have done. They have knocked those bonds. The Government has trampled upon its own pledges to pay. The Government, through its Federal Reserve Board, has refused to lend money on these bonds. They have put these bonds in a subordinate place to the bonds of counties, States, and municipalities. No wonder they sank in value! I could read you here letter after letter from all sections of the country speaking of individual instances where they bought bonds, from $10,000 to $100,000, and from that up to $250,000, and have held them, on the faith of just such promises as this, made by Mr. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury:

> A rich reward is offered to the buyer of Liberty bonds.

He will reap it. It was promised, and he got it. He has a loss of $15 on the hundred on every one of those bonds.

> There is only one thing in the world better than a gold or silver certificate, and that is the United States Government bond.

The gold certificate still goes at par, at face value. The bond has belied the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Again he said:

> The Liberty bonds are practically as good as cash and they pay interest. They can be used for as many purposes as cash without the risk of actual cash. You can get your money practically as easily as you can from a savings bank.

That was the promise, made by whom? By the Secretary of the Treasury, who was selling these bonds. He told the people to come up and buy them, that they would be better than a gold certificate, better than actual cash; because they had with them that provision of safety-bank deposit, in that they bore interest until he was ready to cash in and when he was ready to cash in he could get 100 cents on the dollar. There is the promise. It was broken. Broken by whom? By the Government, and the Government is to-day turning with relentless persistence the same wheels of despotism that are grinding out the life of the people.

England has four and a half times as much money in circulation as she had before the war. France has seven times as much as she had before the war. We have less than we had before the war, and we have 13 per cent less, according to the loanable funds of the banks, than we had prior to the war.

Senators may think that an investigation reaching into months will bear fruit. It will be too late. They may establish farm loan banks which will lend money in 90 days to men who need it now. They will be too late. You may create your foreign corporation board to export our products. It may get into operation six months from now. It will be too late. If we can go that far, we can go all the way. If the Government wants to break its word, or keep on breaking it, let it keep on breaking it; but next time you call on the people and ask them to put faith in the promises of the Government they will mock you with the broken promises that are now bringing them down into distress and ruin.

In the report of John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency, he states that four or five of these reserve banks in the city of New York borrowed as much of the loanable funds of the Federal reserve system as four or five thousand banks in the 21 States which were being served by those banks. He states here, leaving out the name, that one borrower had twice as much of the banks' loanable funds as were loaned by the reserve bank at Dallas to the States of Louisiana, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona—one borrower! Who was that borrower? I could take two guesses, and stake my head on getting the man in one of the two. It was either the J. P. Morgan banking house, or it was the Packing Trust of Chicago.

Is there any precedent, Mr. President, for making these bonds as good as money, and making them circulate as money? Doubtless you will remember, Mr. President, just after the Civil War, when the bonds of this Government did issue and circulate as money. You will remember something like this, in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated September 1, 1865, which carries you and me back, Mr. President, to an early stage in our lives. The following items appeared in the table of money in circulation:

Compound interest, legal tenders, $217,000,000. I give the round figures only.

Temporary loan certificates, $107,000,000.

Certificates of indebtedness, $85,000,000.

Treasury notes, 5 per cent, $32,000,000.

Last issue of the 7.30 bonds, $830,000,000. They were bonds issued as money. They paid the soldier on the battle line, they paid him while he marched, they clothed and fed him in the camp, but they were bonds, and they were made legal tender until the time came when Wall Street sharks, as they do now, wanted to turn everything into interest-bearing bonds, destroying the circulation of the country, the money which actually reached the people, filled the veins of trade, stimulated enterprise everywhere, and made even the South—prone in its agony, in its sackcloth and ashes, in the midst of its burned cities and ruined farms—rise as if by a sudden inspiration and spring into a new life that made the desert blossom as the rose.

We were told, Mr. President, that if these Federal reserve banks were established we would have an elastic currency and no panic. What has become of the elasticity of our currency? It is gone. What has become of the cure for panic? It has become the cause of the greatest panic this country ever knew—the retirement of money, the contraction of the money, the deflation of the money, as they choose to call it.

Who fixed the amount of the damages which the armies of Germany and Austria had done to Italy, France, Belgium, and Great Britain? The Germans did not do it; the enemies of the Germans did it, and after all it was $31,000,000,000, done by four years of operations of the greatest armies that ever came from northern Europe to bear down upon their hereditary enemies, after a titanic struggle of armies which would have swallowed up the armies of Sheridan and Grant and Sherman, of Lee and Stonewall Jackson. You could not have found them in those vast arrays of men on the German side. Yet, after four years of destruction, after four years of frightfulness, after four years of devastation on land and sea, when the enemies of Germany come to bring the expense account against them they make it thirty-one thousand million dollars.

Here is a faithful servant of the United States Government, John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency, who estimates that up to the time he made this report last year our own Government, acting through this reserve board, had accomplished almost as great a destruction of values in this country as Germany had inflicted upon France. Twenty-five thousand million dollars is what Mr. Williams estimated it last year. The destruction has gone on. As Gov. Cox said in that special article which appeared in yesterday's paper, we have not reached the bottom; we have not reached the worst. It is going on from bad to worse, and no man can tell what the climax of the panic will be.

Therefore it is not an exaggerated statement to say that up to the present time, and in the contemplation of the immediate future, whose consequences are bound toward us and will reach us, these reserve banks have inflicted upon our own people as great a loss as the German armies inflicted upon all their foes.

Mr. President, I have offered a simple remedy which will enable the Government to keep its word, which will relieve an immediate necessity, which has the authority of a fixed precedent, and which is so entirely practicable that I do not see how any man can object to it. Why should not the bond be worth 100 cents on the dollar, when the Government sold it for that, got that much money away from our people, and pledged its word to redeem its debt?

You may say, "The time of maturity has not arrived." That is true, Mr. President, but the inducement held out was that these bonds could never depreciate, that they would always be as good as money; that they could be used as money; that they were even better than money, because when a man was not spending them they were in his pocket drawing interest.

I am simply asking by my bill, which is now before the Committee on Agriculture, that this Government redeem its pledge, revive the confidence and the hopes of the people, and thus make it absolutely certain that in the future, if we need more money from the people to finance any war, it can be obtained as easily as it was before.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few observations in connection with the bill now pending, and on subjects related to the pending bill, matters which will be presented in due course when the amendments proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the pending bill are laid before the Senate.

It is claimed the bill to amend the interstate commerce act by adding a section, a new paragraph to section 15a, expressly providing for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal, if enacted into law will, first, stabilize the price of coal; second, do away with the necessity, in large part, for more coal cars; third, remedy the existing inadequacy of terminal facilities; and, fourth, promote regularity of employment in the mines, thus settling most of the grievances of the miners.

Much of this is speculative. Unquestionably, the present situation is unsatisfactory to everybody. The measure has merit, it seems to me, in that it proposes a way to have something done which will enable steps to be taken toward some relief. I am impressed that it will be helpful to the railroads, especially in some regions. It will be of some advantage to the mine owners and operators. If it does nothing more than eliminate some excuses for oppressing the public, it will be worth while. The public has been imposed upon, not to say robbed, and the reasons given as excuses for it have been some of the things this measure proposes to correct.

That it will be a benefit to the mine workers seems quite probable. If it accomplishes what it is claimed in effect it will accomplish—the regulation of employment and better working conditions—that alone would justify its support. There are possibilities in all these directions, very strong probabilities, indeed, as to the latter, and, therefore, I intend to vote for the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I understood the Senator to say that in his opinion the bill would be beneficial to the mine workers. Would the Senator mind saying right here how the bill is going to be of benefit to the mine workers?

Mr. FLETCHER. It would tend to give them steady employment and regular work. I do not say that it will accomplish that fully, but that will be the tendency of it, and that has been the great trouble, as I understand, in connection with the mining of coal.

Mr. WILLIS. Did the Senator hear the statement made by one of the able proponents of the bill the other day that in his opinion this legislation would make it possible to get along with 25 per cent fewer miners than we have now? We now have 762,000. If that be true, this legislation would have the effect of doing away with the services of 200,000 miners. Does the Senator see how that is going to be of benefit to the mine workers in the present industrial conditions of the country?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, if that should be the result, it would not be of any benefit to those who have been displaced or put out of work; but I can see very well how it would be better for the men to have fewer men engaged in mining at reasonable wages and under proper working conditions than to have more men, dissatisfied, poorly paid, and living under bad conditions, engaged in the same work. Notwithstanding some people may have to find something else to do, that is better than to go on under conditions which are unremunerative, which bring about dissatisfaction, strikes, and lockouts, and all that sort of thing.

It is unnecessary to dwell in detail upon the needs of the legislation and what it is intended to accomplish. Others have done that. It will be noted that the commission is to act whenever the commission is of opinion that an emergency affecting the transportation of coal and requiring immediate action exists. I would be inclined rather to broaden the authority. Surely it is limited and restricted enough. Whether the consumer, the public in general, will experience any or much benefit from such a law as proposed, I have grave doubts. I am very much afraid you will not help the consumers much until you go after the dealers. They have talked about the high wages paid the miners, the high rates of freight paid the railroads, and the high expenses of delivery, thereby attempting to lay all the blame for high prices paid by consumers on others.

The truth has been all the time that while these various elements and agencies afforded some ground for the claims of the dealers, they have themselves been the real profiteers. In my judgment, the Federal Trade Commission or some other agency of the Government should give attention to the coal dealers and distributors. There is perhaps legislation sufficient for that purpose.

What I particularly desire to consider in a sort of condensed way are the amendments to the bill proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. The first amendment is that section 15a of the interstate commerce act, as amended, being the section added by section 422 of the transportation act of 1920, be repealed. Other amendments equally important are offered, the object being to repeal the guaranty of earning provisions in the transportation act, to restore the jurisdiction of State commissions, and strengthen the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission respecting the fixing of reasonable rates and prevention of discrimination.

These are matters which should command the most serious thought and the most careful action. I must say that these proposals are timely, and the strongest support they could have is the support based on experience. The transportation act has been in effect 16 months. It has been a tragic disappointment. There have been failures all along the line. The railroads claim to be practically bankrupt, the workers dissatisfied, the public squeezed by intolerable burdens, credits exhausted, traffic reduced, industries crippled, and commerce halted.

Transportation is vital to our economic life. Facilities adequate and at reasonable cost for the movement of passengers and commodities are necessary and the progress of the country is in large measure dependent upon them. They may be so insufficient or so expensive that they fail to serve their purpose. Although the railroad companies have had control of their properties, respectively, for the past 16 months, they not only have not reduced war-time charges for services rendered but they say frankly they see no prospect of price reduction in the near future. That is not satisfactory to the people of the country. They want assurances quite different from that. If that is the best you can do after 16 months of untrammeled operation, it would seem some change in the law is called for.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator intend to discuss in connection with that the proposition that wages are fixed and that the railroads are not allowed to regulate wages?

Mr. FLETCHER. I expect to consider that further on in my remarks. I am getting to that now. I say untrammeled operations. I do not mean, of course, to exclude those regulations and those provisions in the law which to some extent do not give the railroad corporations that free and full control which would be implied by the use of the word "untrammeled," perhaps, but I shall get to the question of wages in a little while.

The people ask the question whether or not the provisions in the transportation act respecting rates that would yield you a certain return on the value of your property has not prompted you to pay extravagant salaries, made you indifferent as to expenditures for supplies, and led to inefficiency and waste. They ask if the railroads have disregarded the rights and interests of the people, resting securely and serenely on the privilege to adopt such rates as will yield a certain return.

If the effect of these provisions has been as indicated, then they had better be repealed. The railroads never troubled to bring up the wage question for something like a year, although asserting that wages have been a bar to a reduction of rates. They seem content to rest on their quasi guaranty and let the public pay. The public is not willing to be treated that way.

If the Labor Board has stood in the way of relief I would favor repealing outright the whole of title 3 of the transportation act. Up to this time that feature in the act has not worked as was hoped. It, too, has been a disappointment. Neither the railroad owners nor the agencies of the Government have been properly considerate of the public. They have all presumed upon the patience and forbearance of a long-suffering people. I hope they have not relied greatly on the supposed stupidity and lack of interest on the part of the public. The people have been quite well informed about what has been going on. They have been keenly concerned, and they have about reached the conclusion that the law should be changed and present practices and conditions made more endurable.

I voted against what was known as the Cummins bill, and I was opposed to the Esch bill, but I voted for the conference report, which I felt was better than either, and offered the last and only chance for any legislation which I felt was needed before the railroads were returned to their owners at the time fixed by the President, March 1, 1920.

The conference report, now the transportation act of February 28, 1920, has had 16 months' trial. Our experience under it has been terrible. I am not convinced that the hardships and troubles experienced were necessary or unavoidable. There has been divided authority and divided responsibility, a stripping of the Interstate Commerce Commission of some of its original functions, and an assumption of some of the powers of the State commissions, all of which have combined to bring about the present situation. As far back as April 12 last, the President, impressed by the seriousness of the situation and the need of improvement, in his address to Congress said:

> To-day American agriculture is menaced and its products are down to prewar normals, yet we are endangering our fundamental industries through the high cost of transportation from farm to market.

And again in the same address he insisted—

> Freight-carrying charges have mounted higher and higher until commerce is halted and production discouraged. Railway rates and cost of operation must be reduced.

Three months have gone by since that address. Is there a reduction of rates? Where is even the promise? The press recently carried a statement, which I presume is correct, as follows:

> RAILROAD PAY ROLL $3,733,816,186 IN 1920—INCREASE OF NEARLY A BILLION DOLLARS OVER AMOUNT PAID IN PREVIOUS YEAR—FIGURES OF 1917 DOUBLED—RETRENCHMENT POLICY REFLECTED IN DECREASE IN PAY ROLL IN FINAL QUARTER.
> The pay roll of the railroads in 1920, after giving effect to the various increases in wages awarded to railroad labor during the year, was approximately $3,733,816,186, and the average number of workers for the year was approximately 2,054,160. When full reports have been received of May and June back pay disbursements the final figures reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission will probably exceed the above figures considerably.
> In 1919 the pay roll was $2,836,800,000, or $897,016,186 lower than in 1920, while the number of employees averaged 1,913,000. In 1917 the total pay roll was only $1,739,482,142, and the average of employees was 1,732,876. From the commission's figures the 1920 pay roll was as follows:

First quarter, old basis	$795,616,330
Second quarter, old basis	801,063,938
May and June, back pay	102,419,680
Third quarter, new basis	1,052,109,451
Fourth quarter, new basis	982,606,787
Total for 1920	3,733,816,186

> When it became increasingly evident in the latter part of the year that business was starting to slide downhill, and factory shutdowns were announced in great numbers all over the country, the railroads realized that retrenchments were in order. They had just carried a record volume of freight, and were straining every faculty adequately to maintain their rolling stock so that that traffic could be handled properly. As the volume of freight offered began to decline the roads found that it was absolutely necessary to cut operating expenses to meet decreased revenues. Thousands of men were laid off, and this was reflected in the decrease in pay roll in the final quarter.
> In some quarters the fear has been expressed that some of the roads have been overzealous in cutting down working forces, and that this will be shown when business begins to improve and these roads are unable immediately to meet the demands placed upon them. In conservative quarters, however, this is not considered probable, in view of the fact that labor is not scarce and that men may be found to fill the jobs.

Notwithstanding the American people were paying $3,800,000,000 for wages to the railroads for their employees in 1920, which was $1,000,000,000 more than the gross receipts of the railroads in 1915, no action was taken by the Labor Board until about June 19, 1921. In other words, the gross receipts of railroads in 1915 were substantially $2,800,000,000 and in 1920 the railroad wages alone were, in round figures, $3,800,000,000. After that experience under high transportation rates and after a solemn investigation lasting over a year, that august body, the Labor Board, decided to act as indicated by this statement.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think that the failure to reduce wages, if it ought to be done, can be charged to the railroad companies under the present state of the law, or should it be charged to the failure of a Government board that has jurisdiction over the subject matter?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think, in the first place, as I have just stated, that the railroad companies themselves did not seem to desire to raise the question as to what was at the bottom of this great increase in rates. They did not seem to desire to confront the question of high wages at all. They seemed to be willing to drift along, and they did not need to do anything else, because under the provisions of the law the public had to pay and not the railroads themselves in the last analysis. The railroad companies delayed taking any action in the matter. They allowed it to go on and on. The rates continued to pile up.

There have been several rate increases in southern territory. In the first place, there was an increase of 25 per cent in southern territory on June 25, 1918. The next increase in southern territory was of 25 per cent on July 29, 1920, an increase of 25 per cent without any question being presented, so far as I can find in the record anywhere, by the railroad companies to the Railroad Board raising the issues as to the amount of wages being the cause of these increases. The railroad companies did not raise the question.

The Labor Board itself, in my judgment, has failed to meet the emergency. I am in favor of getting rid of the dual responsibility of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates that are reasonable and just and of another body just across the street to fix wages, because one depends to some extent on the other, and one can hold back and refuse to act until the other acts.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOODING in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I think the criticism just made by the Senator of the Cummins-Esch bill, if I understood that criticism, is entirely warranted. The provision to which he is now addressing himself I think is a very impolitic one. The Interstate Commerce Commission know what the rates are; they have to impose the rates, and they are in a better position than any independent board to determine the relation which the wages must have to the rates.

But what I was about to ask the Senator was this: Has not the part which he is now criticizing, or to which he is referring, discouraged any effort upon the part of the railroad managers to bring about an equalization of wages, or in some instances a reduction of wages? Have not they rather desired to perpetuate the status quo than to readjust with a view to a general reduction of freight and passenger rates?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, I can not answer from any personal knowledge on that subject. From all I have been able to gather, however, there is a great deal in what the Senator suggests. The disposition was to let things drift along without taking any steps to correct what was apparently an intolerable situation.

I am inclined to think that something should have been done and might have been done, and, of course, primarily, I presume, under the transportation act, Title III, which created the Labor Board, that was the body that should have acted on the question of wages.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand the Senator from Florida to assert substantially that nothing was done by the Labor Board for many months and that it is due, partially at least, to the inaction of the Labor Board that the railroads have been compelled to pay the high wages which make up the labor bill for 1920. Does the Senator remember when the Labor Board was organized?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am not advised as to the exact date when that board was organized. There may have been some delay about creating the board, and, if so, the board is not to blame for that, but somebody else is to blame for it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will allow me, I can inform him upon that point.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am trying to say that they acted, so far as I am advised, only on June 19, 1921.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. The Labor Board was organized about the 1st of April, 1920, or a few days thereafter.

There was pending when the Labor Board was organized a dispute between the railroad administration, the director general, and the employees of the railroad companies, which, in the aggregate, involved more than $800,000,000. That dispute arose in September, 1919. It ought to have been settled by the director general then having charge of the railroads under the recent administration. It was not so settled, however, but was deliberately passed on, to be adjusted by the Labor Board when it came into existence under the transportation act. The Labor Board immediately took jurisdiction of that dispute, and both the railway men and the railroad companies were busy every moment of the time in arguing or presenting to the Labor Board the case, involving, as I said before, more than $800,000,000 annually. That dispute was decided in July, 1920—within about three months of the organization of the board. While I am not called upon to defend the Labor Board, I venture to say that for diligence and for energy in bringing that dispute to a final conclusion, the record of the Labor Board has rarely been equaled in American affairs.

What was the result? The Labor Board rendered its decision in July, 1920, sustaining to a degree the contention of the laboring men, sustaining it to the extent of adding to the labor cost of operating the railroads $700,000,000 annually; not only sustaining it prospectively but compelling the railroads to pay retroactively or retrospectively from May 1, 1920.

At the same time there was brought forward to the Labor Board the question of the validity, the binding effect, of certain so-called national agreements, which largely affected the wages of the men employed upon the railroads. Those national agreements had been entered into in the latter part of the year 1919 and in the early part of the year 1920 between the Director General of Railroads and the brotherhoods and the other unions of which the railroad men are made up.

The Labor Board continued those national agreements, because it held that until disputes came up regularly, originally between the railroad companies and the railroad men, company by company and union by union, the national agreements should be continued. Those agreements are in force to-day; they expire on the 1st of July of this year.

It would seem to me that with that history of the work of the Labor Board, it is hard to criticize it. I do not enter into merits of the dispute; I am not affirming that the Labor Board decided correctly or incorrectly; but I am saying for the Labor Board that it has exercised a diligence and a degree of attention that I have never before seen surpassed.

Moreover, the railroad companies have been from the very beginning doing all that they could do—and probably much more than they ought to have done—in order to reduce the wages of their men. They began immediately their activity in that direction, and they have continued it from that day until now. Of course, no labor board and no tribunal in the country can dispose of these great questions involving not only hundreds of millions of dollars yearly but, I was about to say billions of dollars yearly, without the utmost consideration, for their decision depends upon testimony, upon showing made with regard to conditions which exist.

I have said so much simply to put right from my viewpoint the work of the Labor Board. Everyone has a right to determine for himself whether the transportation act of 1920 is successful or not. I think it is successful; I think it is the only thing that has given the people of this country the transportation upon which all their business and all their lives depend. The men who believe that the Government ought to resume possession and continue in the operation of the railroad companies of the country can well look upon the act as a failure, because it is the only thing that has stood in the way of that plan. Whether the plan is good or bad we will discuss later when the amendments proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] come up and I have an opportunity to say something upon them in my own time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to interrupt him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. REED. What the Senator from Iowa has said is very illuminating. He has established the industry of the Labor Board, its promptness of action, and he has established the promptness of action on the part of the railroad companies in trying to get wages reduced. I am not discussing the merits of the question, but the amount of the whole matter is that the railroads have not been free and are not free to-day to regulate wages. That is done by the Labor Board, and whether they have done it wisely or unwisely is another matter. That is where we come to. So that the railroads can not be justly criticized for not trying to get wages reduced, if, indeed, they should have been so at all, and the Labor Board can not be justly criticized for not acting; but the fact remains that the railroads are not free to fix the wages of their men.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely, Mr. President. The intervention of the Government involves delay in any subject that may arise. The Supreme Court can not decide a case the instant it arises; no court can act and decide a case instantly; and yet we have found it necessary to submit to delays in the administration of justice because justice can be administered in no other fashion.

Whether we did wisely in establishing a tribunal for the settlement of disputes between workingmen and the railroad companies is yet to be determined. I think we decided wisely. I do not believe the railroads ought to have the opportunity to reduce wages precisely as they may see fit. I think that continuity in transportation is of vastly greater importance than the liberty on the part of the railroad companies to do as they pleased with their men. The only way, in my judgment, in which we can preserve regularity and continuity in transportation and avoid the constant interruption which comes from discontent and dissatisfaction on the part of the railway men, resulting in strikes—the only way in which we can keep open these channels of commerce is for the Government to undertake to do justice between the employees and the employer, the railroads. While I am sorry that the whole matter can not be adjusted in a moment, I am not at all convinced that we did not do right in establishing a tribunal to stand between selfishness of the railroad companies on the one hand and the natural desire for higher wages on the part of the railroad men on the other hand, and I believe that the experience of the American people will demonstrate the wisdom of what we have done in that respect.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the passage of the transportation act was the means of doing away with Government operation and preventing Government ownership, and the only means of doing it, it was unquestionably a good thing to do. I do not want the Senator to get the impression that I am in favor of the Government owning and operating the railroads. I never have been in favor of that proposition. The Labor Board began to function rather earlier than I supposed it did. It may be ever so industrious; I realize that it has had to deal with some big questions; but it was from April, 1920, to June 19, 1921, determining that a reduction of 12 per cent in the wages of railroad employees should be made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, technically the Senator may be right; but in July, 1920, the board determined that the railroad men should have an increase of wages amounting, as I said before, to about $700,000,000 a year.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what was the percentage of that increase? I want to compare it with the other figures.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was a percentage of something like 20 per cent. That is a rough guess. The Senator from Florida may condemn the action of the board in advancing the wages of the railway men, but he can not say that it was very slow or laggard in reaching a result. A change in conditions, it is alleged, between July, 1920, and June, 1921, has resulted in an announcement on the part of the Labor Board that it will reduce the wages about 12 per cent, taking it all together; but I do not believe the Senator from Florida will contend that in view of the conditions which existed in July, 1920, with the cost of living at its very height, the Labor Board was not justified in advancing the wages of the men as it did.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not intend to get into a discussion of the question of wages. In my judgment, many of the experienced, skilled men on the railroads have never been getting too much, and are not to-day. In my judgment many of the unskilled, inefficient workers on the railroads have been getting too much.

In my judgment, there ought to be a reclassification and a readjustment of the whole wage schedule. That is the way I feel about it. I am not going into any details about the matter, but here are the railroads claiming that they can not reduce rates because of the high wages, and here is the Labor Board saying, "We will not reduce wages because you will not promise to reduce rates and thereby reduce the cost of living"; and there you are. I say they are suspended between heaven and earth, like Mahomet's coffin, between the Labor Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they are getting nowhere, and the people are paying, paying, paying.

I submit, Mr. President, without reading it, this article entitled:

Nearly all roads to appear to-day before rail board. Refers to those affected by $600,000,000 wage award in July, 1920, not previously asking a cut. Will lower pay for all employees. With 12 per cent, total $400,000,000 yearly savings to country to go into effect.

I ask to have that inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEARLY ALL ROADS TO APPEAR TO-DAY BEFORE RAIL BOARD—REFERS TO THOSE AFFECTED BY $600,000,000 WAGE AWARD IN JULY, 1920, NOT PREVIOUSLY ASKING A CUT—WILL ASK LOWER PAY FOR ALL EMPLOYEES—WITH 12 PER CENT, TOTAL $400,000,000 YEARLY SAVINGS TO COUNTRY TO GO INTO EFFECT.

CHICAGO, June 19.

Nearly every railway in the country affected by the $600,000,000 wage award of the United States Railroad Labor Board in July, 1920, which had not previously petitioned for wage reductions, will appear before the board to-morrow with requests for lower pay for all employees.

Two wage hearings already have been held, the first resulting in the decision of June 1, cutting the wages of 104 carriers 12 per cent, effective July 1. More than 150 roads were included in the second hearing on which no decision has been pronounced. Members of the board have indicated, however, that there would be little variation in this decision from that of the first hearing. Provision was made in the June 1 decision for making additional railroads parties to that decision at any subsequent date.

With the completion of the third hearing and the anticipated 12 per cent reduction on all roads, the total estimated $400,000,000 annual savings on the country's railroad labor bill will be put into effect.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the public thought on this subject is quite clearly expressed in an editorial in the Tampa Morning Tribune of June 2, 1921, which I wish to insert here in full, entitled "The pendulum swings." I will not take the time to read it. I ask to insert that editorial in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE PENDULUM SWINGS.

Some five years ago the railroad brotherhoods began an insistent campaign for higher wages; and it must be remarked in all fairness right here that for the most part the men were badly paid, especially the office help and the maintenance-of-way men, which latter division includes the track laborers.

Naturally the labor unions struck while the iron was hot—at a time when the world was convulsed by the greatest war in history, when everything depended upon transportation, and when the transportation lines of the country were clogged with goods in transit, bearing much of the burden of Europe's pressing needs as well as our own normal requirements.

America had not yet entered the war, but the threat was over us and we were getting ready for the inevitable. The railroad workers threatened to go on strike throughout the Nation, and the railroad owners, with many of the roads already in bankruptcy, refused the demands for higher pay. Finally Congress passed the Adamson law and an orgy of railroad legislation began, with the men's demands met both as to wages and hours, with financial ruin staring the roads in the face.

And so it went on, and the country entered the war. The men wanted more money, and again there was threat of a nation-wide strike of railroad workers. That civilization depended upon their remaining at their posts of duty seemed not to hang a hair's weight in the balance. Patriotism seemed to have been shed by them as a duck throws water from its back. The roads were taken under Government control as a war measure, and wages were raised and raised again until the mere gateman who looks at your ticket as you seek entrance to the train was in many instances receiving a greater monthly wage than the division passenger agent. War measures? Yes. Just and deserved? No. To be sure, the cost of living had soared.

Coincident with the various raises in pay the roads were granted higher and higher freight and passenger rates. Of course, the public paid. That was inevitable; the public always pays.

Even in 1920, a little more than a year ago, the Railway Labor Board, a piece of machinery created by Congress to attempt to settle the question of wages for the railway workers, added $600,000,000 a year to the railways' labor costs. And rates went higher, and the public wondered if the railway workers and the railway owners of the country were going to take everything in sight. Well, they did, almost.

Finally, with public sympathy lost to the railway workers—the railway owners haven't had public sympathy since the art of railway making was taken from the hands of the men who actually build the roads and take pride in them and fell into the hands of financiers, so called, whose chief aim and object appears to be to water stocks and demand dividends on impossible capitalization—the public began to demand relief. Public opinion always controls when it is really exerted. The indubitable evidence that freight rates had gone beyond the possible maximum of "what the traffic will bear" was seen in countless fields and orchards where produce rotted by the thousands of barrels and bushels and carloads because it was no longer possible to ship and sell and pay the freight and break even; loss of precious food needed here and there throughout the length and breadth of the Nation, forcing prices up when prices should be coming down.

And all these things combined to create a public demand for relief. The railway owners said they could not meet expenses even with rates so high, and they proved it easy enough by showing their balance sheets. Their business had become so bad, and is so bad, that the banks can't afford to lend them money to meet their needs, for it isn't sound finance to pour money into institutions which can not pay interest on the investment.

So the Railway Labor Board held many meetings, and listened to the arguments of the owners on one hand for a steep cut in wages, and of the workers on the other hand that wages should not be cut. The result has been a cut in wages—direct—that will lessen the railroads' burden, it is estimated, by at least $400,000,000 a year. Also a reclassification of labor which the roads estimate will cut costs an additional $300,000,000.

The labor cut averages 12 per cent, really a small part of the total advance in the past five years. The actual cut ranges from 5 to 18 per cent. The owners claim that the reclassification of labor, which they have fought for, will untangle a snarl of overlapping effort which not only has been costly by limiting what one man might do in the way of turning a nut upon a bolt in car repair, or fitting a pipe, or mending a broken door, as it were, but will work toward greater production at less cost.

So far so good. Public opinion has done this much. Now, what the same owners of that opinion want to know is, what profit shall accrue to the general public? Will there be a lowering of freight rates so that perishables may again be marketed at a profit and the Nation be fed more economically, or is this orgy of high freight rates, which kept pace with the orgy of high wages, to be continued?

Mr. Average Man isn't concerned over the fact that a road which is actually worth $100,000,000 is capitalized at $250,000,000 or $500,000,000 and the stockholders are clamoring for dividends on the larger amount. What he is concerned in is witnessing a withdrawal of the "water" from the stock and the getting down to a sane level where the roads will once more be able to pay a proper dividend on a proper valuation or something approximating a proper valuation. The general public doesn't care a rap about who is responsible for past misdeeds, but is very much concerned in preventing further inroads into the public purse.

It doesn't require any great amount of sagacity to figure out this much: That the owners of the railroads of this country must either rearrange their business so that freight rates can be made more reasonable or the same public opinion that is now helping them to win their way back to financial stability will demand and bring about public ownership and operation of these properties.

The Tribune does not want to see Government operation of the railroads again. But that is inevitable unless the owners of the roads heed the lesson.

Mr. FLETCHER. In the meantime what has been happening?

First. The railroads have not, they claim, been earning interest on their indebtedness, taxes, insurance, and fixed charges in many cases, and in no case as much as the law allows. They may have gotten rid of some unnecessary high-salaried help, but they have kept up quite generally the extravagant pay of officials and have been exceedingly deliberate about reducing expenses.

Second. The volume of traffic has decreased because it could not bear the excessive cost of transportation. There are idle cars and parked rolling stock.

Third. Industries have suffered, business has been suspended because of high freight rates, and domestic commerce to a degree stagnated.

Fourth. The basic industry of agriculture has been discouraged and made to languish, while consumers were obliged to pay exorbitant prices for their supplies.

Fifth. Development, new enterprises, progress in all directions, have been retarded and will continue to be until there is more efficient service at less cost than can now be had.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Florida may not be familiar with the fact that in the year beginning on the 1st of March, 1920, and ending on February 28, 1921, the railroads moved a greater volume of traffic and more passengers than they ever moved before in the history of the country. There is great misapprehension, to use the mildest term, with regard to the effect of the railroad rates upon the volume of traffic.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have heard of that position taken by the railroad companies and have heard of those general figures; and the same argument has been urged by the railroad companies when the question of the excessive freight rates on Florida products has been raised. "Why," they said, "we never had such a volume of business out of Florida," and they never did before. Their earnings on Florida products have increased 304 per cent since 1917, but never in the whole history of the State have there been more grapefruit and oranges and vegetables rotting in the fields of that State than there have been this season.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. STANLEY. I have heard the statement made in the hearings to which the chairman of the committee refers, and I was surprised myself to hear it, especially with reference to the Senator's country, because I have been under the impression that the higher rates had materially affected the movement of products from Florida and from the South; and I asked these experts the question which I now propound to the Senator from Florida: If the present schedules continue to prevail with reference to the movement of vegetables and fruit, will that volume of business from the Senator's State continue, or will the industry dwindle to a point where you will have no surplus to ship to distant points, like New York and Boston?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the latter condition will inevitably result. I will say to the Senator in all frankness that we can not expect people to put their money into an enterprise like the laying out of an orange grove or the development of a truck farm when they know in all reason that they never will be able to get their products to market on any basis that will yield them a profit. It means a decrease in the volume of traffic to-day as compared with production. That is what we must depend on. We have had an enormous increase in the total volume of traffic because of the enormous increase in the production of the State; but there is a decrease in the volume of traffic caused by these high rates, and there will be death to progress and development caused by these high rates. The people will not put their money into these undertakings when they know that what they raise can not be gotten to market at a profit.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know anything about the merits of individual rates. It may be that the rates from Florida upon the chief productions of that State are too high and need readjustment. I express no opinion upon that point. I only want the Senator from Florida to remember the fact that taking all the railroads in the United States together, from the 1st of March, 1920, to the 1st of March, 1921, they earned no net railway operating income. They earned not a cent for the payment of interest upon bonds or dividends upon stock; and it is quite difficult for me to see how the earning power of the railroads can be very materially reduced, if we are to continue in private operation, unless we reduce in some way the cost of maintenance and operation. Then the railway rates ought to be reduced. I do not see how they can be reduced until that object is effected, although I say again that it may very well be that the rates from Florida on grapefruit and oranges and the like are entirely too high, and ought to be readjusted and reduced, as compared with other rates.

Mr. FLETCHER. Undoubtedly the Senator is correct. In order to make any permanent reduction of rates there must be a reduction in the cost of operation and cost of maintenance of these properties. I quite agree with that. My insistence is that there ought to have been found a way to accomplish that to some degree at least; and further I insist, and I want to see if the Senator disagrees with me about it, that rates may be so high as to decrease rather than increase earnings, as to lessen the amount of revenue rather than increase the amount of revenue, as to injure both the railroad companies and the public.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think any student of the subject understands that to be true. Rates may be so high that the net result to the railroad companies may be a diminution of the net income.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I have always assumed that when a railroad company found a rate so high that it deprived it of a revenue which it might otherwise enjoy, the railroad company would be the first to reduce that rate. I know that the railroad companies may be mistaken about that; and I am sure it will be gratifying to the Senator from Florida to know that the Interstate Commerce Commission since the 1st of last September, when the rates were advanced, has, in cooperation with the railroads, readjusted, as I remember, more than 5,000 rates upon individual products.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the railroads will be a little dilatory about acting, whenever it comes to reducing rates, unless they are practically compelled to do so.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. I am very much interested in the profound discussion of this subject by the Senator from Florida; and I wish to call his attention to this phase of the matter, which probably he has investigated himself:

The situation with reference to Texas and Florida products is, in my opinion, to a great extent due to the fact that the railroads have attempted to meet lower water rates from the Pacific coast, and the ton-mile charge for similar products from Florida, the Gulf coast, and Texas is much greater. You are within, say, 700 or 800 miles of the cities on the Atlantic seaboard, and you pay approximately the same rate that is paid for similar products hauled by water or by rail 2,000 miles or 4,000 miles. In my opinion, an investigation will show that in order to make the whole system of transportation remunerative—that is, the hauling of fruits and vegetables from all over the United States proper—the railroads have been forced to put a larger rate upon Florida products in order to sustain the present rates from the Pacific coast and to meet the lower charge by water incident to the opening of the Panama Canal.

Mr. FLETCHER. There may be a great deal in what the Senator suggests, and I am much obliged to him for the thought. It is quite generally complained, by Florida fruit growers, that the rates on Florida products are not even equal to the rates on California products, for instance. The California growers can get their fruit to the Atlantic seaboard at very much less cost than the Florida grower can get his product to the Pacific. I do not know why that is, but that seems to be the truth. Actually, Florida products are excluded from the markets west of the Mississippi River, but the California products are permitted to get into this Atlantic seaboard territory at pretty nearly the same rates as the Florida products get there.

Mr. STANLEY. Rates are rarely ever fixed upon a mileage basis. It is not the distance hauled but the conditions, and it is an effort to meet the lower rate that is now being charged by refrigerating ships leaving the Pacific coast and coming through the canal.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps that is quite true. Still, I see no reason why Florida products should be excluded from the markets west of the Mississippi River.

Mr STANLEY. I am not claiming that they should be.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am saying generally, Mr. President, that the transportation act of February, 1920, has failed to accomplish what it was hoped it would accomplish. There is divided responsibility. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been shorn of some of its vital powers and to a degree swept from its moorings. The Labor Board has utterly failed.

We need to get back to the original purpose and function of the Interstate Commerce Commission and continue in it exclusive jurisdiction to fix reasonable and just rates and prevent discrimination. Let the power rest there. Do away with this dual authority. Get rid of a situation where one body can say, "We can not lower or readjust rates until another body determines the question of wages," and the latter body saying, "We can not adjust wages until we know there will be a reduction of rates, thereby reducing the cost of living."

One agency should have control of both questions. Responsibility can then be fixed. Delay and haggling while the public suffers will be avoided.

How long do you suppose we can live in a situation where the carriers receive more than the producers out of the proceeds of farm products?

But you say I have been indulging in generalities and you want me to be specific. Very well; allow me to give you some facts pertaining to railroad operations in Florida. I requested the Florida railroad commission to inform me what were the prewar and present rates on commodities shipped to various points named from Jacksonville, which is a basing point and terminal for railroads in and operating out of and into Florida.

Here is the statement which I ask to have inserted. It shows that the approximate increase in freight rates on all commodities named is 56.2 per cent over prewar rates. The statement covers citrus fruits, pineapples, celery, beans, potatoes, cabbages, canteloupes, and lumber, and, as I said, the approximate increase on all commodities named is 56.2 per cent over prewar rates, to St. Louis, Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. I ask to have the table inserted without reading.

There being no objection, the table referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Prewar and present rates on commodities shipped from Jacksonville, Fla.

	Citrus fruits and pineapples, carload rate per standard box.		Celery and beans per standard crate.		Potatoes per 100 pounds.		Cabbage per 100 pounds.		Watermelons per 100 pounds.		Cantaloupes per 100 pounds.		Lumber per 100 pounds.

Approximate increase on all commodities named is 56.2 per cent over prewar rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. In view of the fact that railroad wages have more than doubled, in many instances trebled, and in view of the fact that all materials which go into either the maintenance or the construction of a railway have doubled or more than doubled, does the Senator from Florida think it remarkable that railroad rates should have increased 56 per cent?

Mr. FLETCHER. Some of these rates are higher; but these rates were already high. Before there ever was any increase they were high on these particular commodities, and if the rates were justified originally, my contention is that something ought to have been done to get them down within 16 months after the roads were turned over to the private owners.

Let us take a look at the figures as to passengers, also. What I am saying, of course, is not peculiar to Florida. It is merely illustrative of what prevails throughout the country. Here are the passenger figures:

Present cash passenger fare, Jacksonville to Washington	$28.41
War tax, 8 per cent	2.27
Total cost	30.68
Prewar mileage, passenger fare, Jacksonville to Washington (790 miles, at 2 cents)	15.80
Present Pullman fare, lower berth	8.63
War tax, 8 per cent	.69
Total cost	9.32
Prewar Pullman fare, lower berth	4.75

It is inconceivable that as many people travel under these rates as would travel under prewar rates. Independent of the question of burdening the traveling public, the railroads must collect fewer fares, and it is doubtful if their revenues are increased by these high rates.

An instructive exhibition is furnished by Mr. J. C. Chase, a responsible citizen of the highest standing and wide experience in producing, shipping, and marketing citrus fruits. Here is his letter of April 21 last, with statement attached, as follows:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., April 21, 1921.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: You will be interested in the attached statement showing increase in freight charges paid railroads during the past four seasons on Florida citrus fruit, based on the haul from Orlando, Fla., to New York City.

While all of the fruit does not go to New York City, we believe that the average freight charge from all of the citrus-producing points in Florida to all of the markets in the country will average approximately the New York freight rate, and the statement will serve to illustrate the point we wish to make, which is that the transportation companies operating out of Florida are now collecting from the Florida growers on the present crop and at the present rate 304 per cent more freight charges than was paid during the season 1917–18. Other products from Florida have increased proportionately, and also the charges, so that you can realize what an enormous amount of money is being paid out to the transportation companies on Florida perishable products alone.

If you would look into the traffic now moving you would find that the railroads serving Florida and California are in more prosperous condition and have fewer idle cars than roads operating in any other territory.

There is one thing sure, we must have lower freight rates on Florida grapefruit into the Pacific coast markets. The present rate is so high that it has practically excluded Florida grapefruit from many of the markets where we placed a great many cars under the prewar rate. California citrus fruit moves to the Atlantic coast markets at a rate of approximately $1.50 per box. If this is a satisfactory rate to the railroads, why is it that the charge on a box of Florida citrus fruit is almost double from a Florida producing point to a Pacific coast market? A person can travel east and west at the same rate per mile, and we believe that similar products should not be discriminated against.

Yours, very truly,

CHASE & CO.
J. B. CHASE.

Statement showing increase in freight charges paid railroads during past four seasons on citrus fruits, based on haul from Orlando, Fla., to New York, N. Y.

Season.	Number boxes shipped.	Freight rate charged.	Per cent increase in rate.	Freight charges paid railroad.	Increase in freight charges paid over season 1917–18.	Per cent increase in freight charges over season 1917–18.
1917–18	5,581,309	$0.61	.....	$3,404,598.49	.....	.....
1918–19	8,946,204	.76½	25	6,843,846.06	$3,439,247.57	101
1919–20	12,495,925	.76½	25	9,559,382.63	6,154,784.14	181
1920–21	13,500,000	1.02	67	13,770,000.00	10,365,401.51	304

Still, as I said to the Senator a moment ago, grapefruit and oranges are actually rotting to-day in the fields in Florida, and vegetables have been plowed under in various other fields, because they could not get them to market.

The railroads argue that the great increase in the volume of traffic proves that the high freight rates have not deterred shipments. This is unsound. The increase in business has been due to the great increase in production. The fact is, I am reliably informed, that more oranges, grapefruit, and vegetables were left in the fields the past season than ever before, simply because the cost of carriage was prohibitive. This retards development, naturally, because the farmer reasons, "What is the use of my growing potatoes, even though I produce 360 bushels per acre"—which he can, and the same land will yield three other crops the same year—"if my crops can not be moved to market at a cost which will leave to me a margin of profit?"

Of course, these high rates, which are prohibitive, not only cause decreases in traffic, but retard development.

Last week a friend of mine, for instance, shipped me a barrel of watermelons. Three very delicious melons, packed in a barrel with Florida moss, arrived in perfectly splendid condition. The barrel weighed 100 pounds. The express charges were $3.53 plus the war tax of 18 cents, making a total of $3.71. The cost of carriage amounted to $1.23 per melon, from Jasper, Fla., to Washington, D. C. I believe the express company divides 50.25 with the railroad company.

That sort of thing, of course, means forcing a producer back to the ox-cart and stage-coach days, when his only market was the nearest town to where he grew the stuff. One dollar and twenty-three cents per melon was the actual carrying charge of that melon from the railroad station in Florida to Washington, D. C. I would not regret even that much, because they were fine melons; but you can imagine what the grower would get with such an expense as that.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator add to his interesting statement about the melons the information where those melons are now? Senators on this side are interested in knowing what became of them.

Mr. FLETCHER. They have long since been consumed. They lasted only about three days—one for each day.

Mr. CUMMINS. I might suggest to the Senator that if he had used a barrel apiece for each of the melons, and only shipped one melon in a barrel, it might have cost him still more. I assume he is not serious in putting this example before us so far as affecting the melon trade is concerned, because melons are not usually shipped one in a barrel, or even three in a barrel.

Mr. FLETCHER. I realize that; but upon that subject I would like to insert here an editorial from the Florida Times Union, entitled "How it is divided." I will not take the time to read it. It quotes from the railroads themselves. For instance, it was shown that melons yielding the grower 7½ cents yielded the carrier 12.7 cents. That has been the average where they have been shipped in bulk; the grower gets 7½ cents and the carrier 12.7 cents.

There being no objection, the editorial referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW IT IS DIVIDED.

From the Columbus Enquirer-Sun we clip an extract from a speech delivered by Senator HARRIS, of Georgia, on the transportation question. It is as follows:

"In order that you may see at a glance what the last advance in freight charges represents—using an average load, 1,000 melons, at average freight of 27 pounds each—I invite your attention to the following tabulation: Using Albany, Ga., as a representative shipping point the advance per melon is as follows: Baltimore, Md., 4.2 cents; Philadelphia, Pa., 4.8 cents; New York, N. Y., 4.9 cents; Buffalo, N. Y., 4.9 cents; Pittsburgh, Pa., 4.8 cents; Chicago, Ill., 4.7 cents; Cincinnati, Ohio, 2.3 cents. The returns to the growers on last year's crop averaged about $75 per car, and approximated 7½ cents per melon. The last investigation into the price at destination yielded the fact that the consumer paid very much more than was warranted by the returns to the grower plus the transportation charge. For instance, it was shown that melons yielding the grower 7½ cents and the carrier 12.7 cents, Albany to Baltimore, or a total of 20.2 cents for the producer and the carrier, sold in Baltimore for $1."

Of course, these figures make a bad showing as to transportation charges if they are compared with what the shipper receives, but they do not show the charges too high as compared with what the consumer pays. They impress us with a feeling almost of hopelessness of accomplishing anything by the efforts that are being made to remedy the evils that are patent and that efforts are being made to remedy.

Transportation charges are too high, but they can not be reduced as long as railroad labor receives such high wages. The labor cost of operating the railroads is said to take 70 per cent of the operating capital. On this basis we will go a little further than the figures given by Senator HARRIS. The grower of a watermelon gets 7½ cents for it. Railroad labor gets 8.9 cents, and the railroad, in addition to paying labor, gets 3.8 cents. But all this foots up 20.2 cents to get the melon to the city where the consumer lives, and then as he buys it for a dollar it costs 79.8 cents to get it to him after it has reached the city he lives in. The grower gets less than one-tenth as much as the middleman gets, railroad labor gets only one-ninth as much and the railroads for hauling the melon a thousand miles get, in addition to what they pay for labor, only one-twentieth as much as the middleman gets. The middleman gets four-fifths of the whole.

Now, what is the use of a reduction anywhere until that cormorant is gotten out of the way? If the railroads hauled it free, would the dealer who buys from the grower give him any more or sell for any less to the consumer? Watermelons are perishable and the dealer must get a good profit, but as long as he is permitted to take more than half there is no sense in growing watermelons for distant markets.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does not the Senator conceive many cases in which it costs a good deal more to transport freight 1,000 miles than it does to produce the commodity?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is so in a good many cases; but I submit to the Senator if that were to be the case with reference to these commodities, moving in carload lots, as these do, of course they would cease to move; that is all. The grower can not afford to ship and take the chances of raising the crop, and buy the fertilizer, cultivate the crop, and pack it, and ship it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is speaking about carload lots. I judge from the question of the Senator from Iowa that it is to be inferred that in carload lots the cost might be different.

I want to call the Senator's attention to a statement which was published and sent, I think, to all Senators by one of the leading banks of New York City, in a monthly publication reviewing the business of the country. It came to us from the Irving National Bank, the Chase National Bank, or the National City Bank, I have forgotten which one. In that statement they told about shipments in carload lots from Florida to New York City, and gave a list of names of men who had shipped various kinds of fruit from Florida to New York City. In several instances the owner of the product shipped by carload lot, after he had paid the freight to New York City and the commission, still owed $40 or $50, besides losing his entire product, and in quite a number of cases it showed that the returns received by the Florida producer for a carload of different kinds of fruit were $10 or $12 or $15 or $25 for a whole carload. So I take it that even in carload lots the cost of transportation, whatever the cause may be, or whether right or wrong, is of such a nature that it would certainly prevent men from very long staying in that kind of business if they had to pay that kind of transportation charges.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am much obliged to the Senator for reminding me of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I must be permitted to say in this connection that the incident cited by the Senator has happened many, many times in every season and in every year. It happened before the war, it happened before the freight rates were increased, and it will happen again whenever the market for the particular commodity refuses to receive it at a price that will compensate the owner.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator again on that point?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Iowa had been in New York and bought some of this fruit he would have found that the consumer had not been getting any great reduction but was paying a fabulous price. I am not mentioning the proposition as an argument on either side of the question but as a fact. If it exists and continues to exist, whatever the cause, it certainly will interfere with the Florida man in his production, and he will have to go out of business.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it is permanent, then, of course, it would end the industry; but we have a large watermelon production in the State of Iowa, and I have frequently known of carloads of watermelons from one part of the State coming to my own little town that have been sold at a price that did not pay the freight. I am sure the Senator from Florida knows of many such instances.

Mr. FLETCHER. That often happens. There are instances of that kind which arise at different times all during the year; but the cars to which the Senator from Nebraska had reference were not loaded with watermelons.

Mr. NORRIS. No; those cars were not loaded with watermelons.

Mr. FLETCHER. They were entirely other products. That thing happens quite too often to be very comfortable for people who are engaged in the business. Whether it is a regular thing or not, it happens too often.

A correspondent wrote, April 5, 1921:

We are confident that the carriers are making a good profit on the fruit and vegetable shipments they handle. * * * The freight rates always were high on this commodity, and since they have been increased the last couple of times they certainly are out of sight and have become a burden to the growers and shippers.

Again, on April 19 last, a correspondent wrote:

The freight charges on Florida fruits and vegetables to some of the most important markets of the country are prohibitive. * * * The country is now suffering from an attempt on the part of the transportation interests of the country to pass on to consumers the increase in freight charges. The consumers have organized a strike against such additional increases, and the high rates instead of bringing increased earnings are showing losses to all of the railroads owing to decreased tonnage. We can only hope that all interests will work to accomplish a decrease in the operating expenses of the transportation companies that will eventually permit a lowering in freight rates.

Another correspondent aptly observes:

Primarily the railroad company is interested in the produce and in the price paid the producer by the wholesaler. Out of that money comes the freight and transportation charges, and not out of the prices obtained by the retailer from the consumer. If by reason of the failure of the producer to net a reasonable return on his labor and investment he will cease producing, and the railroad will have nothing to haul and the consumer nothing to consume, therefore the producer is the one to be considered in all cases of this kind rather than the consumer.

A vigorous protest comes from Messrs. Chase & Co., large distributors, dated June 20, in which they say:

We trust that you will join us in our protest against the granting of the application of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad for permission to declare a stock dividend. The Florida growers of perishable products feel that this surplus has been wrung out of their pockets by the high freight rates on their products. It does not belong to the stockholders but it belongs to the producers.

There should be no stock dividends from transportation companies until there has been a readjustment of freight charges. We do not believe all this propaganda that is being put out by the transportation companies that the freight charges on perishables make no difference and that the middleman is getting all the cash.

We feel more strongly now than ever before that the last 25 per cent increase granted the carriers was a huge mistake, and the quicker it is wiped out the better. We do not believe the traffic officials of the transportation companies will be any quicker to reduce freight rates than railroad labor will be willing to take a reduction in pay. If the transportation companies will voluntarily wipe out the last increase, they can ask their employees with better grace to take smaller pay.

What I have been talking about involves much more than the products of grove and truck farms, although that alone means the shipment of 58,218 carloads during a season out of the State. To show what that business means, I wish to insert in the RECORD without reading a statement from the Tampa Morning Tribune of June 20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

FLORIDA HAS DONE WELL.

The statement that the watermelon season is practically closed in Florida, although there will probably be 1,000 more cars to go out, brings to mind that the Florida shipping season practically ends with the last of the melon shipments.

Officially, the Florida shipping year for fruits and vegetables begins September 15. The transportation companies keep a daily record of the all-rail shipments going out through Jacksonville, High Springs, and Hampton, the three main gateways for freight, to points out of the State.

The records through June 17 give us the following total carload shipments since September 15, 1920: Grand total cars, all products of grove and truck farms, 58,218; oranges, 20,615; grapefruit, 13,018; tomatoes, 5,903; celery, 4,730; miscellaneous vegetables, 4,576; watermelons, 2,777; lettuce, 2,623; Irish potatoes, 2,332; cabbage, 1,406; strawberries, 105; pineapples, 102.

The total of 58,214 cars of fruit and vegetables averaged 6,448 cars a month of 30 days, and gave a daily average movement of 215 cars over a 9-month period. In other words, during the entire past nine months, Florida sent out to a hungry Nation 9 cars of fruits and vegetables every hour of the 24 in every day of that time.

This speaks pretty well for Florida. Especially when we are informed by the ignorant that the "Florida shipping period is only a few months in the winter."

In addition to this all-rail shipment of Florida produce, making a train 666 miles long, not counting the engines and tenders, one must bear in mind that thousands of boxes, crates, and baskets of fruit and vegetables have gone out by express, and thousands of smaller-sized boxes, baskets, and crates went by parcel post; and there are yet 1,000 cars of melons to move.

The thing that counts most in this showing is the long term over which these shipments are made. Even on the 17th of June, the record for the day was 224 cars made up of watermelons, tomatoes, miscellaneous vegetables, and pineapples. They talk about "ever-bearing" this and that certain thing in Florida. Why, the entire State is an ever-bearer of something that is needed and taken by the eating public.

We make no attempt to value that 666 miles of train loaded with all Florida fruits and vegetables. You can make your own figures, bearing in mind that the lowest price for cabbage reported was about $600 a car, while peppers sold as high as $3,000, tomatoes to $4,500, watermelons up to $1,000, and oranges as high as $2,600 a car. You may get your own average from these five items and multiply it by the 58,214 cars already gone out. Then say whether or not Florida had done fairly well.

Mr. FLETCHER. Lumber, phosphate, naval stores, and other products I need not mention. Increased rates apply to them also. Florida's exports to foreign markets, moving through her ports, amount to over 1,000,000 tons a year. The principal increases in southern territory have been 25 per cent on June 25, 1918, and another increase of 25 per cent on July 29, 1920.

The situation is not hopeless. In the Washington Post of June 23 Mr. Warfield is quoted as saying that with proper economy and the return of normal conditions the railroads could earn 6 per cent and also reduce rates. No man is better qualified to speak on the subject, because no man has a clearer, fuller knowledge of it than Mr. Warfield. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD without reading the item just referred to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The item referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, June 23, 1921.]

SIX PER CENT RETURN FOR ROADS IS SEEN—ECONOMICS AND NORMAL BUSINESS WILL DO IT, WARFIELD TELLS SENATORS.

Study of the railroad problem was resumed yesterday by the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, with S. Davies Warfield, president of the National Association of Owners of Railroad Securities, as the chief witness.

"The question for the moment is," Mr. Warfield said, "can sufficient revenue be obtained from rates and fares that will be considered reasonable by the public and the shippers, and will these rates bear a relation to the price obtainable for the articles transported that will not impede commerce, or will part of the money required to meet the necessities of transportation have to be supplied in the public interest by taxation?"

The latter meant Government operation and eventual Government ownership, and should be avoided by all means, the witness declared. He expressed the belief that with proper economies and the return of normal business conditions the railroads could earn a 6 per cent return and also reduce rates, adding that the recent increase in rates could be held accountable for the contraction of the carriers' business.

Mr. FLETCHER. It would be better to withdraw the guaranty, reduce the rates, and let the roads survive, if they can, by economical operation and management; and if they can not survive, let them go into the hands of receivers or into bankruptcy and be reorganized on a basis which would insure proper capitalization, with no water or inflated values, than to force the public to pay the high freight and passenger rates required to yield 6 per cent on present high valuation or capitilization and under present laws and methods of operation. Reorganization on a proper basis of valuation would make it possible to operate at lower rates and prevent Government operation or ownership, and the public do not want either.

The increases in freight rates which became effective last August were expected by the Interstate Commerce Commission to add about $125,000,000 a month to the gross revenues of the railways. April, 1921, disclosed a gain of only a little over $30,000,000 over the same month of last year. For April of this year reports from 201 roads, with a mileage of 235,160 miles, showed a gain of 7.76 per cent in operating revenue, a decrease of 6.2 per cent in operating expenses, and a net operating increase of $29,201,000 as compared with an operating deficit of $23,767,000 in 1920. There seems to be some little improvement.

The average wage cut of 12 per cent, which will go into effect July 1, affecting about 1,700,000 men, will have a bearing on the financial situation of the carriers.

Just now the public is at a disadvantage. There are too many bureaus and agencies involved. The processes are complex, the delays insufferable, the machinery too complicated. The law should be simplified, stripped of involved and unnecessary and therefore harmful provisions. In this shaking-down process called readjustment the railroads will have to take their losses, undergo anxiety and stress just like other great enterprises and industries are doing. All must be treated alike, and all without favor or prejudice or discrimination must fight out the struggle, each on its own merit. The railroads ought to have fair, just treatment, an equal chance with any other great business. Consideration of the fact that they render indispensable public service is proper, but special privileges and special favors or guaranties are not in the public interest, especially when there has been time to recover from the demoralization incident to war conditions, and especially true if they are set free to work out their own salvation, subject only to such regulations as were contemplated when the law creating the Interstate Commerce Commission was enacted.

Amendments making in the direction of the original purpose creating one agency empowered to see that reasonable and just rates are maintained and no discrimination practiced in interstate commerce I shall support.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I desire to have printed and lie on the table. It need not be read at this time unless it is so desired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 27, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord, Thou art the first and the last, the beginning and the end, and infinitely more than the heart can dream or tongue can tell. Do Thou condescend to bridge the chasm between our Creator and His children, between our loving Father and His earthly children. Do Thou preserve us from the bondage of ignorance, that we may know Thy law and love Thy precepts. Direct us by the revelation of Thy truth and bless us with the ministry of Thy grace. For Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, June 24, 1921, was read and approved.

A QUORUM.

Mr. DYER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DYER. To make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. That is filibustering.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. DYER (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an editorial written by ex-Gov. Cox, of Ohio, former nominee for President of the United States on the Democratic ticket.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an editorial by former Gov. Cox, of Ohio. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I second that request, because I desire to have that editorial as widely disseminated as possible.

Mr. GARNER. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Wyoming.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

DAYTON, OHIO, June 26.

The leading editorial in the Dayton Sunday News to-day, under the caption, "An Unhappy Harvest," was the first public expression of former Gov. James M. Cox, Democratic presidential nominee in 1920, since his defeat. The editorial was written by Mr. Cox and said in part:

"The recent statement of Mr. Babson, who is recognized as a statistician and an analyst of unusual qualifications in economics, has caused a profound impression. Idealism at times may fail to make any impression on the practical thought of the country. In the ultimate it will, of course.

"The influence of the purse, however, is unfailingly instantaneous. The purse nerve is highly strung. When conditions touch it dogma and bigotry and fetich are submerged. The result of the Babson pronouncement is but another case in point.

"If the American mind had been stripped clean to the human conscience and counterconsiderations, sordid, political, prejudicial, and otherwise, had not entered into the equation, a very positive mandate would have been issued at the polls last November in behalf of the noblest international principle that ever has been advocated in behalf of civilization.

"CITES ATTITUDE OF BUSINESS.

"We go one step further. If the purely practical view had been applied honestly, those who might not have been influenced ordinarily by moral consideration would have realized the importance of concerted world-wide action in behalf of the whole economic situation. Nothing is to be gained at this time save in plain language. In large part the attitude of business in the last campaign was not above unworthy motive. There was a resentment against the forms and the volume of taxation, and it was expressed in the sustained bitterness against Woodrow Wilson.

"The Wilson haters were not enraged at him as a personality—taxes developed an obsession, and it spread like an epidemic. Millions of dollars have not been contributed throughout the years to the reactionary cause from wholly patriotic purpose. They always have been regarded as an investment, and the slogan that business would be better under a reactionary régime was born of experience because preference had been showered upon certain interests by governmental policy.

"CALLS TIMES UNPRECEDENTED.

"In the past the financial burdens of administration have been shifted largely to the mass, and the belief that it would be done again accounted for the almost hysterical support that business rendered to the reactionary cause in the campaign of 1920.

"The statement that taxes would be reduced doubtless was based by some on an honest belief.

"They failed, however, to recognize that these are unprecedented times. We can not chart the future by the past. The interest and sinking fund charges on our national debt a year are as much as was our entire debt at the close of the war in the States in 1865. In some manner a minimum of $5,000,000,000 must be collected to maintain the integrity of our obligations and meet the current cost of government.

"SAYS TAXES CAN NOT BE CUT.

"That no change in taxation policy worth the name is possible is evidenced by the embarrassment of the administration at Washington. Turn, as it will, to the many suggestions that have come, the ultimate realization is that the country has a large financial burden to bear and very heavy taxes are inevitable.

"Mr. Babson accounts for the recent lowering of security values and the unfavorable trend of business generally from the circumstance of the speech made by Ambassador Harvey in London, in which he said in plain words that we were a selfish Nation, had acted from that impulse, and intended to stick to our own affairs in the future.

"If the habit of diplomacy that has ruled throughout the years had been waived, the unfavorable reaction from the Harvey statement would have jarred the American Nation.

"We are the great creditor of the world. We possess the controlling supply, and other nations are guarded in what they say, lest offense be given.

"AFFAIRS GROW WORSE, IS CLAIM.

"Mr. Babson is right. The Harvey episode has been most disquieting. Our economic affairs become worse daily. No remedy in the form of statute or administrative policy has turned the unfavorable trend. Values have dwindled to the danger point and thousands of men and women and business concerns whose financial stability has never been questioned are wondering to-day whether or not they are worth a cent.

"We are gathering the harvest of our own sowing. Except for the operation of the Federal reserve bank system, we would be in the midst of the worst panic the world has known.

"Nevertheless, a process of liquidation is going on in the banks just as fast as it is safe to conduct it. Business and physical property, on present standards, that do not equal their indebtedness in the banks, quietly are being closed out.

"COULD HAVE BEEN AVOIDED.

"Assets change in valuation, but debts never do.

"How easily it all could have been avoided. If the treaty of Versailles had been ratified by America, if we had taken our place in the councils of the nations of the world when the war was over, economic readjustment would have come under conditions that would not have brought the distress that we now witness. That was the psychological moment for action, but notwithstanding our delay, the time was ripe in the latter part of 1920, and if a mandate expressive of the real conscience of America had been expressed in November last year Europe would have received the credit necessary for the purchase of commodities needed.

"The dawn of rehabilitation was in sight, but it was obscured by a result the effect of which in its extremity has not been felt even yet. In a word, our unhappy business conditions to-day are due to vast inventories bought at high prices and that can not be sold even at great reduction. Europe needed every dollar of our surplus of farm and factory, and we had a prosperity not long ago upon which we could have based a credit that would have saved the day. The stagnation on the farm in November and December in 1920 and the surplus of manufactured goods all could have been avoided. Inventories would have been turned into cash and the banks to-day would have had more money than at any time in the history of the country.

"SEES STROKE OF PARALYSIS.

"In times past, when manufacturing was at low ebb, banks had ample funds; now money is tight and factories are doing little or nothing, for the very reason that vast inventories have not been turned into funds.

"Readjustment at its worst under the circumstances of international cooperation would have been as but a slight fever. We are witnessing a stroke of paralysis. That's the difference. That's the cost.

"Babson has spoken in words that men understand because his subject matter concerns their pocketbooks.

"The Good Book says: 'Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.'

"When the cloud of war lifted we, rich in resources, almost beyond words and relatively untouched by tragedy, had the opportunity to be the good Samaritan, to reach out our hand and bind up the wounds of a stricken world. Within God's sight we turned away and passed on the other side. What can we expect now?"

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. To-day is unanimous-consent day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

EXCHANGE OF GOVERNMENT LANDS, HAWAII.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4598) to provide for the exchange of Government lands for privately owned lands in the Territory of Hawaii.

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill 1072, as amended by the House committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill 1072, with amendments of the House committee, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1072) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the motion was to pass the Senate bill with amendments. The Clerk has omitted the reading of the Senate bill. I have no objection to that being done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. When a motion to suspend the rules is made, the practice is to read the portion of the bill and the amendment that is intended to be passed.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the Speaker hear me a moment upon that? I know that has grown up to be the practice, but here is a motion which in effect is to consider the Senate bill and pass it so amended as to read as follows. I submit that if the Senate bill is going to be considered, it must be reported, at least by title, and if objection is made it must be reported in full. Then, after it is reported in full, the Clerk will read the text of the House amendment which is the pending motion to substitute for the Senate bill—in other words, to pass the Senate bill with the amendments. I submit that the Senate bill ought to be reported by title, of course, if nobody objects, but if somebody insists then that it should be reported in full. I know we have gotten into the habit of doing it the other way. I insist that the bill from the Senate when called up must be read.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the motion is to suspend the rules and pass the amendment made by the House committee to the Senate bill. That does not require the reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, I think the RECORD will show that the gentleman from Wyoming is in error in stating that the motion was made in that form. As I caught the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN], it was to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill with House amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that in stating the question he stated it was to pass the Senate bill as amended by the House committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is because of the fact that I caught the motion as I have stated, as made by the gentleman from New York, that I have called attention to it. I have no objection to dispensing with the reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. MONDELL. If there is any question about it, the gentleman from New York can again submit his request to pass the Senate bill as amended by the House committee.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that the practical purpose is best effected by simply reading the portion of the bill which it is expected to have enacted, because the motion to suspend the rules does not allow more than one vote. In ordinary cases the Senate bill is reported and then the House amendments. Then the vote comes first on the amendments and then on the bill as amended. Of course, under a suspension there is only one vote, and that is on the passage of whatever has been read. That has been the practice, and the Chair thinks that conforms to the convenience of the House. Only the matter is read which the House is to pass upon. It seems to the Chair to be clearly a waste of time to read the Senate bill and then the amendments. Inasmuch as the practice is in the way the Chair has suggested, the Chair is disposed to rule that all the Clerk ought to report is the title of the Senate bill and then the portion that may have been left by the House committee, and the amendment of the House committee.

Mr. WINGO. I think the Speaker is right as a practical proposition. I think it would be useless for anyone to demand the full reading of the Senate bill. I think the reporting of the Senate bill by title is a technical reporting of it to the House, but the point I want to impress is that we can not consider a Senate bill without its being reported.

Of course, unless there was some special reason, I think it is mere captiousness simply to insist on the House being burdened with the reading. As I understand the Senate bill has been reported by title. I hope no one will insist on its being read in full, but I do insist on the fact that the motion seems to be to pass the Senate bill——

Mr. MONDELL. The bill has been reported by title.

The SPEAKER. It certainly would remove everybody's objection if the gentleman from Arkansas, for instance, would ask unanimous consent——

Mr. WINGO. But I submit the practice is that where it is not demanded a bill is reported simply by title, and so if no one demands it the Clerk would read as he has read. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee, possibly, insisted that the Senate bill should be read. I do not know——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No, Mr. Speaker; the gentleman from Arkansas misunderstood me. I caught the motion of the gentleman from New York to be to move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill as amended by the House. Now, I did not notice the way in which the Speaker stated it to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is the way he stated it, as amended by the committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, that being the case, I say that unless by unanimous consent the reading of the Senate bill were dispensed with it would have to be read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? Suppose the motion of the gentleman from New York had been to move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill (S. 1072) with amendments to the House committee only so far as sections 1 and 2 are concerned. Does the gentleman contend that he would have to read the Senate bill and all the amendments reported by the House committee?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think that would depend upon the form in which he submitted the motion. But, Mr. Speaker, in order to eliminate the difficulty I will ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Senate bill be dispensed with.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think that is necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would not be read under the ruling of the Speaker. There is no necessity of establishing such a precedent as contended for by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. I will submit to the gentleman the precedent has been established at least three or four times on my insistence.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the motion was very clear and definite——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended by the committee, and that was what the Clerk was proceeding to read.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HICKS. Has not the Chair rendered a ruling in reference to how this bill shall be read?

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair has indicated his opinion, but still he is willing to hear gentlemen.

Mr. HICKS. If the opinion has been rendered, I will call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in his discretion to listen to argument as much as he pleases.

Mr. HICKS. I think the Chair was absolutely correct in the way in which he stated the proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the reading of the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

As amended by section 5 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and .or other purposes," approved February 28, 1919, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That for the purpose of this act the term 'rural post road' shall be construed to mean any public road, a major portion of which is now used, or can be used, or forms a connecting link not to exceed 10 miles in length of any road or roads now or hereafter used for the transportation of the United States mails, excluding every street and road in a place having a population, as shown by the latest available Federal census, of 2,500 or more, except that portion of any such street or road along which the houses average more than 200 feet apart; the term 'State highway department' shall be construed to include any department, commission, or board having adequate powers and suitably organized to discharge, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Agriculture, the duties herein required of the State in the construction and maintenance of roads improved hereunder; the term 'construction' shall be construed to include reconstruction and improvement of roads; 'properly maintained,' as used herein, shall be construed to mean the making of needed repairs and the preservation of a reasonably smooth surface, considering the type of the road, but shall not be held to include extraordinary repairs, nor reconstruction; necessary bridges and culverts shall be deemed parts of the respective roads covered by the provisions of this act."

SEC. 2. That the portion of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, which reads: "Provided, That in States where the constitution prohibits the State from engaging in any work of internal improvements, then the amount of the appropriation under this act apportioned to any such State shall be turned over to the highway department of the State or to the governor of said State to be expended under the provisions of this act and under the rules and regulations of the Department of Agriculture when any number of counties in any such State shall appropriate or provide the proportion or share needed to be raised in order to entitle such State to its part of the appropriation apportioned under this act," is hereby amended to read as follows: "Provided, That any State desiring to avail itself of the benefits of this act shall, not later than three years after the adjournment of the first regular session of the State legislature from and after the passage and approval of this act, provide State funds each year at least equal to the amount apportioned for such year by the Federal Government to said State for the construction of highways: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be deemed to prevent any State from receiving such portion of said principal sum as is available under its existing constitution and laws, or to receive their proportionate share of each year's appropriation under existing constitution and laws until three years after the adjournment of the next regular session of the legislature from and after approval of this act."

SEC. 3. That section 4 of the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That so much, not to exceed 3 per cent, of the appropriation for any fiscal year made by or under this act as the Secretary of Agriculture may estimate to be necessary for administering the provisions of this act and for carrying on necessary highway research and investigational studies independently or in cooperation with the State highway departments and other research agencies, shall be deducted for these purposes, available until expended. Within 60 days after the close of each fiscal year the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine what part, if any, of the sums theretofore deducted for such purposes will not be needed and apportion such part, if any, for the fiscal year then current in the same manner and on the same basis as are other amounts authorized by this act apportioned among all the States, and shall certify such apportionment to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the State highway departments. The Secretary of Agriculture, after making the deduction authorized by this section, shall apportion the remainder of the appropriation for each fiscal year among the several States in the following manner: One-third in the ratio which area of each State bears to the total area of all the States; one-third in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the total population of all the States, as shown by the latest available Federal census; one-third in the ratio which the mileage of rural delivery routes and star routes in each State bears to the total mileage of rural delivery and star routes in all the States, at the close of the next preceding fiscal year, as shown by the certificate of the Postmaster General, which he is directed to make and furnish annually to the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, That no State complying with the provisions of this act shall receive less than one-half of 1 per cent of the total sum apportioned among the States for each fiscal year."

SEC. 4. That the first paragraph of section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That any State desiring to avail itself of the benefits of this act shall, by its State highway department, submit to the Secretary of Agriculture project statements setting forth proposed construction of any rural post road or roads therein. If the Secretary of Agriculture approve a project, the State highway department shall furnish to him such surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates therefor as he may require: Provided, however, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall approve only such projects as may be substantial in character, and the expenditure of funds hereby authorized shall be applied only to such improvements: And provided further, That he shall not approve any projects in any State until said State shall provide a State fund adequate for the maintenance of Federal-aid roads and by law shall place said maintenance work under the direct control of the State highway department: Provided further, That in any State where the existing constitution or laws do not provide for such maintenance or will not permit a State fund for maintenance, the Secretary of Agriculture shall continue to approve projects for said State until three years after the adjournment of the first regular session of the legislature from and after the approval of this act: Provided further, That the funds for maintenance are appropriated or provided by the civil subdivision of the State and are expended under the direct control of the State highway department. Items included for engineering, inspection, and unforeseen contingencies shall not exceed 10 per cent of the total estimated cost of the work.

"If the Secretary of Agriculture approve the plans, specifications, and estimates, he shall notify the State highway department and immediately certify the fact to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon set aside the share of the United States payable under this act on account of such projects, which shall not exceed 50 per cent of the total estimated cost thereof, except that in the case of any State containing unappropriated public lands and reservations under Federal control exceeding 5 per cent of the total area of all lands in the State, as shown by certificate of the Secretary of the Interior, which he is directed to make and furnish annually to the Secretary of Agriculture, the share of the United States payable under this act on account of such project shall not exceed such 50 per cent of the total estimated cost thereof plus a percentage of such total estimated cost equal to one-half of the percentage which the area of the unappropriated public land plus the area embraced in reservations under Federal control in such State bears to the total area of such State: Provided, That the limitation of payments not to exceed $20,000 per mile, which the Secretary of Agriculture may make, be, and the same is hereby, increased in proportion to the increased percentage of Federal aid authorized by this amendment. No payment of any money apportioned under this act shall be made on any project until such statement of the project and the plans, specifications, and estimates therefor shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture."

SEC. 5. That section 7 of the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. To maintain the rural post roads constructed under the provisions of this act shall be the duty of the States. If at any time the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that any road in any State constructed under the provisions of this act is not being properly maintained, he shall give notice of such fact to the highway department of such State, and if within 100 days from the receipt of said notice said road has not been put in a proper condition of maintenance by the State highway department, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall thereafter refuse to approve any project for road construction in said State until such road has been put in a condition of proper maintenance, and if within 100 days from the receipt of said notice the said road has not been put in a proper condition of maintenance, then the Secretary of Agriculture, in addition to such refusal to approve any further project for road construction in said State, shall proceed immediately to have such road put in a condition of proper maintenance by letting contract therefor and shall charge the costs thereof against the Federal funds allotted to such State. Upon reimbursement by the State of the amount expended by the Federal Government for such maintenance work, said amount shall be paid into the United States Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts, and the Secretary of Agriculture shall then approve further projects for said State."

SEC. 6. That in approving projects to receive Federal aid under the foregoing provisions the Secretary of Agriculture shall give preference to such projects as will expedite the completion of an adequate and connected system of roads interstate in character. Before any projects are approved in any State, such State, through its State highway department, shall select or designate not to exceed 7 per cent of the total road mileage of such State as shown by the records of the State highway department at the time of the passage of this act. Upon this system all Federal-aid apportionments shall be expended. Roads which may receive Federal aid shall be divided into two classes, one of which shall be known as primary or interstate roads and shall not exceed three-sevenths of the total mileage which may receive Federal aid, and the other which shall be known as secondary or intercounty roads and shall consist of the remainder of the mileage which may receive Federal aid. The Secretary of Agriculture shall have authority to approve in whole or in part the systems as designated or to require modifications or revisions thereof: Provided, That the States shall submit to the Secretary of Agriculture for his approval any proposed revisions of the designated systems of roads above provided for. Not less than 60 per cent of all Federal aid allotted to any State shall be expended upon the primary or interstate roads until provision has been made for the improvement of the entire system of such roads. Whenever provision has been made by any State for the completion and maintenance of a system of interstate and intercounty roads equal to 7 per cent of the total mileage of such State, as required by this act, said State, through its State highway department, by and with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, is hereby authorized to add to the mileage of interstate and intercounty road system as funds become available for the construction and maintenance of such additional mileage.

SEC. 7. That section 8 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1919, is hereby amended to provide that 50 per cent of the appropriations therein made shall be expended on roads within or partly within the national forests and embraced in or constituting necessary extensions of the system of main roads in the State, Territory, or insular possessions, and that this amount shall be apportioned among the States, Territories, and insular possessions in which are located the national forests in the ratio which the area of the national forests within each State, Territory, or insular possession bears to the total area within the national forests: Provided, That the cooperative agreement for the survey, construction, and maintenance of any such road or trail shall be between the Secretary of Agriculture and the proper officials of the State, Territory, or insular possession. The remaining 50 per cent of appropriations therein made shall be expended on roads and trails necessary for the protection, administration, and utilization of the national forests, and shall be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture in proportion to the relative needs of the national forests, taking into consideration existing transportation facilities, value of timber or other resources served, relative fire danger, and comparative difficulties of construction. The Secretary of Agriculture may waive cooperation on such forest roads where essential for the protection, administration, and utilization of the forest: Provided further, That if more than $6,000,000 is appropriated for any one year under the provisions of this section the excess shall all be added to the 50 per cent applicable to roads forming parts of or extensions of the system of main State roads.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall encourage a more general understanding of the economic use of public roads and highways and shall collect, publish, and demonstrate for the benefit of all sections of the United States useful information on highway transport, construction, and maintenance, which shall also include such recommendations as he may deem necessary for preserving and protecting the highways and insuring the safety of traffic thereon.

SEC. 9. That any sums apportioned to any State under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, and all acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, shall be available for expenditure in that State for the purpose set forth in such acts until two years after the close of the respective fiscal years for which any such sums become available; and any amount so apportioned remaining unexpended at the end of the period during which it is available for expenditure under the terms of such acts shall be reapportioned in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916.

During the reading of the above the following occurred:

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. STAFFORD). For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. Has the Clerk concluded the reading of the bill?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I demand a second.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if the gentleman who demanded a second is opposed to the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington makes the inquiry as to whether the gentleman from North Carolina is opposed to the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. He is not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there anyone present opposed to the bill who demands a second?

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill and I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York to demand a second.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman from New York, who calls up the bill, in favor of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules, and under the rules of the House he is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I assume, then, he will yield to those in favor of the legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. STAFFORD in the chair). The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] makes the inquiry as to whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] is in favor of the bill. The Chair will state that under the uniform practice when a gentleman moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill he is presumed to be in favor of the bill, and has charge of 20 minutes allotted for debate in favor of the bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] demands a second in opposition. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CONSTRUCTION OF RURAL POST ROADS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] is entitled to 20 minutes and the other gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that my colleague from New York [Mr. HICKS] desired me in his absence to take charge of the time in opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SNYDER. I am.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNN. I would like to have a ruling of the Chair as to whether anyone is entitled to take charge of the bill who is against the provisions of the bill, even though he is chairman of the committee?

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ROBSION. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] interrogates the gentleman from New York, may we know what the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry was? We did not hear it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN], the chairman of the Committee on Roads, who moves to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill with House amendment, states that he is opposed to the bill and wishes to know whether he is entitled to control the time under those circumstances for 20 minutes in debate.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will allow me, I do not know whether that is a parliamentary inquiry or not. True, it presents a situation which I am sure will appeal to the gentleman from New York if he will stop for a moment to think of the situation presented. The gentleman from New York may, of course, very properly hold any opinion for or against the bill, but I think the gentleman will scarcely desire to control the time on behalf of the bill and speak against it. So it occurs to me that, if the gentleman is to speak against the bill, the proper way for him to do it would be to yield the time on behalf of the bill to some one who is in favor of it.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that, under the admission of the gentleman, the time should be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] or some other gentleman in favor of the bill.

Mr. ROBSION. Will the gentleman yield? I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this is my bill, and the Roads Committee ordered me to report it and have charge of the bill on the floor of the House; and it was my understanding that the Speaker would recognize me this morning to offer to pass the bill as amended by the Roads Committee. I have talked with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS], and he had already yielded 10 minutes of his time in opposition to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN], and I certainly shall oppose both of the gentlemen from New York controlling all the time on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that it was within the right of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN], as chairman of the Committee on Roads, to move a suspension of the rules and pass the bill, which he did. The question now is as to how the time of 40 minutes under the rule, 20 minutes in favor thereof and 20 minutes against, shall be allotted. It has been the uniform practice for a gentleman moving a suspension of the rules to have charge of the time in favor, because it is the presumption that as he moved to suspend the rules to pass the bill, he naturally favored the passage of the bill, else he would not have moved its passage.

But the Chair is confronted with an unusual condition, unknown to him in his 14 years of service in the House, wherein a like situation has never occurred.

It is within the power of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] to yield, if he desires, the 20 minutes to any Member he sees fit who is in favor of the bill, or to allot the time individually to those whom he believes are in favor of the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So that if that is the desire of the gentleman, we will proceed with the consideration of the bill under that condition.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair under the rule to see that the 40 minutes provided in the rule shall be apportioned, 20 minutes to those in favor and 20 minutes to those in opposition. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] has control of 20 minutes, and his colleague from New York [Mr. SNYDER] has control of 20 minutes. The gentleman has stated the rules of the House correctly.

Mr. RAYBURN rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. RAYBURN. I rise to submit a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAYBURN. And before I do that I would like to make a little statement, if I may. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Since reading this bill again, and carefully, I find that, although very much in favor of legislation of this sort in the past, I can not support this bill. It absolutely wrecks the whole road system of the United States. It makes it necessary for us to adopt a constitutional amendment before we can participate.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is not talking to the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RAYBURN. I had unanimous consent to speak for two minutes.

Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman is entirely in error.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I am not entirely in error. I know what the bill says. Before my State can participate in the provisions of this law it has to adopt a constitutional amendment. I do not want my State to be coerced in such a way in order to participate in this.

Now, my unanimous-consent request is this: From the fact that I can not get time to make a statement, and nobody else from my State is on the list to oppose this bill, I ask unanimous consent that the time, instead of 20 minutes on a side, be limited to 30 minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time fixed by the rule be extended 20 minutes, so as to have 30 minutes on a side. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I have no objection to that, provided it is understood that the time shall be equally divided between those in favor of the bill and those against the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am perfectly willing to make that modification.

Mr. DUNN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York objects. Has the gentleman from New York any suggestion to make to the Chair as to the disposition of the time to those in favor of the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, if I may so state, it is within the jurisdiction of the gentleman controlling the time to say what disposition shall be made of the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But there can not be, under a fair construction of the rules, any right to allow Members who are opposed to the bill to control the 40 minutes, so that no 20 minutes will be allotted to those in favor of the bill. [Applause.] It is the duty of the Chair to see that the time to which they are entitled is awarded to those in favor of the bill.

Mr. TOWNER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. It was exactly right and within the precedents for the Speaker to do as he did in recognizing the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN], but, as he himself has stated, it is to be presumed that the person who moves to suspend the rules is in favor of the bill.

Now, we come to another question, and that is as to control of the time. It does not necessarily follow that the person who moves to suspend the rules should control the time. But the rule does state that the time must be controlled and be given one half to those favoring the bill and the other half to those opposed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Right there, it is the duty of the Chair to see that 20 minutes is allotted to those in favor of the bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Exactly; and this is the question I want especially to submit: It having been determined by the committee itself that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] should present the matter to the House, and he being in favor of the bill and representing the committee with respect to the bill, would it not be perfectly proper for the Chair to recognize him to control the time of those favoring the bill? It seems to me it would be perfectly proper.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for the allotment of debate is under the control of the Speaker. It has been the practice, as stated by the present occupant of the chair, that the Member making the motion would have control of the time. It would relieve the situation and it would relieve the Chair if the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] will yield the 20 minutes at his disposal to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION], and we would then proceed with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DUNN. I wanted to clarify the matter as to whether I was entitled to take this position or not. I want no advantage that is not mine, and I should like to have a ruling of the Chair to that effect. Am I entitled to take charge of the bill and have the 20 minutes?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will allow, that involves the question as to whether or no, by making the motion to suspend the rules and then by insisting that some one in opposition to the bill shall control the other side, the gentleman from New York may bar those who are in favor of the bill from being heard. Of course, that is contrary to all parliamentary rules and practice.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Since the Chair has made his last statement in relation to the control of the time, he has had his attention called to a precedent that is somewhat in point. It is found in Second Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 1449, the syllabus of which is as follows:

> The chairman of a committee, having in committee opposed a bill, must in the House yield prior recognition to a member of his committee who has favored the bill.

The Chair holds that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] when recognized by the Speaker had the right to move the suspension of the rules, as he did to pass the bill, but upon his statement that he is opposed to the bill and the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] that he is in favor of it and was directed by the Committee on Roads to take charge of the bill, will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky for 20 minutes in favor of the bill, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] in opposition for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I submit this: The minority has some rights here. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] is, I think, properly entitled, and I think the Chair has ruled correctly in accordance with the precedents. I desired to call attention to that.

Now it develops that there are gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who are opposed to the bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has just stated that he is opposed to the bill. Would not the gentleman from Texas be entitled to recognition over the gentleman from New York to control the time in opposition, if he requests it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will refresh the memory of the leader of the minority by stating that when the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] was made to suspend the rules and a second was demanded by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] the Chair asked the gentleman from North Carolina if he was opposed to the bill and he said he was not. He did not qualify.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] then rose and said that he demanded a second because he was opposed to the bill. No Member of the minority rose to claim recognition in opposition to the bill. If he had, the present occupant of the chair would have recognized him under the uniform practice of party division.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But it has developed——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But no Member of the minority having arisen to demand a second, the Chair recognized the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But, Mr. Speaker, with all deference, it has developed, before the debate has begun, before a word has been said upon the subject in the way of debate, that there is a Member of the minority who announces that he is opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ah, but the gentleman comes too late with that. The demand should have been made at the time when a second was demanded. The Chair can not set aside the order of the House whereby a second has been considered as ordered, and dispossess the only gentleman rising in opposition and demanding recognition of the time, which under the invariable practice has been under his control.

Mr. RAYBURN. It was just done in the case of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAGEE. I think that the rights of the minority should always be fully protected. I ask that the time for debate be extended 20 minutes, to be controlled by some one of the minority recognized by the Speaker.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended 20 minutes, that 20 minutes to be controlled by some member of the minority.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The objection of the majority leader removes the necessity for my inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not know——

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALMON. Would it be within the province of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] to yield a part of his time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] in order that the minority members of the committee who are in favor of the bill may have an opportunity to be heard?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly, that would be his privilege.

Mr. ROBSION. I have done so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, President Harding in his recent message to the Congress made the following statement bearing on the road question:

> Transportation over the highways is little less important than transportation over the railroads. The highways are not only feeders for the railroads and afford relief from their local burden, they are actually lines in commerce. They are the smaller arteries of the larger portion of our commerce, and the motor car has become an indispensable instrument in our political, social, and industrial life. There has begun a new era in highway construction, the outlay of which runs far into the hundreds of millions of dollars. Bond issues by road districts, counties, and States amount to enormous figures, and the country is facing such an outlay that it is vital that every effort be directed against wasted effort and unjustifiable expenditures.
> The Federal Government can place no inhibition on the expenditures in the several States; but, since Congress has embarked upon a policy of assisting the States in highway improvement, wisely as I believe, it can assert a wholly becoming influence in shaping the road policy.
> With the principle of Federal participation acceptably established, probably never to be abandoned, it is important to exert Federal influence in developing plans looking to the promotion of commerce and apply our expenditures in the surest way to guarantee a proper return for money expended.
> I know of nothing more shocking than the millions of public funds wasted in improved highways, wasted because there was no policy of maintenance. There is nothing that Congress can do more effectively to end this shocking waste than condition all Federal aid on provisions for maintenance. Such conditions insisted upon in the grant of Federal aid will safeguard the public which pays and guard the Federal Government against abuses which tend to defeat the very purposes for which we authorize Federal expenditures.

FEDERAL AID AN ESTABLISHED POLICY.

The President says that Federal aid to the States for roads may now be considered an established policy. He also says that it is a wise policy and should not be abandoned. He points out that the public roads of the country mean more for transportation and commerce than the railroads, and the great and primary object in having the Federal Government to aid highway construction is to create "good-roads" sentiment, promote commerce, upbuild the mail service, the social and industrial life of the Nation, and to bring the producers and consumers of the country together; but the President insists that a well connected and correlated system of highways under a definite policy, with adequate provision for their maintenance and upkeep only should receive Federal aid, and to fail to provide for their maintenance would be an unwise and wasteful policy. So far as we have been able to observe, the people of the Nation want to see less money spent for armies and navies and more money spent for good roads. We rejoice to see the President take the lead in this splendid policy. The question before the Congress is, What is the best plan to bring about a connected system of Federal aid highways and provide for their maintenance?

THERE ARE TWO PLANS BEFORE THE CONGRESS.

Our bill proposes to amend and strengthen the present law and is backed by the American Highway Association, made up of the highway officials of the 48 States, and the American Farm Bureau, with 1,500,000 farmers as members. The other plan is known as the Townsend plan, promoted and backed by the American Automobile Association and the American Automobile Chamber of Commerce.

Quite a number of bills have been introduced in the House and referred to our Committee on Roads. These include the Dowell bill and Robsion bill. The American Highway Association, as well as the American Farm Bureau, with other associations interested in good roads, indorsed the Dowell bill. Senator PHIPPS introduced a bill in the Senate, S. 1072, which passed the Senate. This bill was referred to our committee. It amends the present road law in two respects: (a) To extend the time one year for the States that have not taken up their quota of Federal aid, (b) to permit greater Federal participation on roads in the States having large areas of public lands, but it does not increase the quota for such States. While the Phipps bill and the Dowell bill have been taken up and indorsed by these several associations some time ago, the parliamentary situation was such that I moved to strike out all of the Phipps bill after the enacting clause and substituted what is now known as the Robsion bill. The Robsion bill contains all of the provisions of both the Dowell and the Phipps bills, with some amendments further protecting the rights of the States. Mr. DOWELL has rendered great service for the cause of good roads. He generously and unselfishly agreed to the Robsion substitute, and that is the bill now before us for consideration. Mr. DOWELL has been, and is now, doing all he can to secure its passage. There is no better friend to good roads in Congress than the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL]. In this connection we might mention Mr. M. C. Markham, who is the legislative representative for the Association of American Highway Officials. He has worked day and night for this legislation. His services have been effective and extremely valuable. Likewise, Mr. Gray Silver, representing the American Farm Bureau Federation, has made a strong fight for this legislation. He has been earnest and active all of the time, and, like Mr. Markham, his efforts have brought splendid results to the cause of good roads.

The highway officials of many States and the representatives of many good roads associations and all of the members of the Roads Committee of the House except the chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN], have been very active in the support of this legislation and have given very effective aid.

FARM TO MARKET ROADS PRODUCERS TO CONSUMERS PLAN.

The President's thought was in his message that it was wise for the Federal Government to aid the States in the construction of roads in order to promote the commerce of the country, to bring the producers and consumers together. The present road law was approved July 11, 1916. Nearly $300,000,000 have been appropriated by Congress under this law to aid the States. Practically every State in the Union has changed its constitution, and all of them have changed their laws to meet the requirements of the present law. Every State in the Union has laid out a system of roads with the approval of the highway department at Washington. Many of the States, like Kentucky, have by legislative enactment established a system of roads reaching to every county of the State, to be first improved with Federal aid. The central thought in the road systems laid out by every State is an interstate and intercounty system, "a farm to market" system, to bring the producers and the consumers together, to create good-road sentiment in each and every community, to promote the commercial, social, and industrial life of each and every community. Our bill and our plan as set out in this bill merely amends and strengthens the present road law in order to give to the country a definite system of "interstate and intercounty" highways and to require the States to provide funds to maintain these Federal-aid roads when once constructed. This bill makes the States the unit in dealing with the Federal Government to secure Federal aid, and it is the unit in providing funds to maintain the Federal-aid roads. Kentucky, as well as many other States, has already made provision for this.

Our bill does not change the apportionment of Federal aid to the States, except it provides that no States shall receive less than one-half of 1 per cent of the total appropriation. This amendment affects the States of Delaware, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, and Vermont. These small States have many roads and are subjected to heavy interstate traffic, but because of their small area they receive a small amount of Federal money. We think it only fair that these States have each at least one-half of 1 per cent of the Federal appropriation. There are 11 Western States with large areas of "public lands." We amend the law so that there may be greater Federal participation on such roads as receive Federal aid. For instance, more than 90 per cent of the total area of the State of Nevada is public lands. Roads must be built through these public lands, but no taxes can be collected on the part of the States, as these lands belong to the Federal Government. Without this amendment these Western States must be greatly handicapped. The country as a whole is interested in good roads being built through these States. Our bill extends the time one year for taking up Federal aid by those States that have not been able to do so. This bill also meets a great need in building roads and trails through the Government forest reservations. We think the amendments to the present law submitted in this bill meet the requirements in constructing a splendid system of interstate and intercounty roads with provisions for proper maintenance.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. The gentleman means that they are backing the House bill.

Mr. ROBSION. Yes; all of these associations and organizations, as well as the Federal highway department, are backing this bill and are opposed to the Townsend plan.

AMERICAN AUTOMOBILE ASSOCIATION AND TOWNSEND PLAN.

The American Automobile Association and the American Automobile Chamber of Commerce have for years been sponsoring a transcontinental or interstate system of roads, Federally built and maintained. A coast-to-coast system, just a few Federal roads through the country, perhaps one road passing through each State. Several years ago Congressman Hobson, of Alabama, introduced a bill in the House embodying this plan. It was defeated and the present Federal aid road law adopted. Last year Senator TOWNSEND introduced a somewhat similar bill in the Senate, but it did not find favor with the road department here or the road officials of the several States or the persons who are interested in "farm-to-market" roads or a system of interstate and intercounty-seat roads, such as we now have. Senator TOWNSEND introduced a new bill in the Senate recently. It has the same old idea as the Hobson bill and the Townsend bill of last year, with some changes that might deceive some people, but is the same in principle. The Townsend plan proposes to do away with the present Federal aid road law and to establish a new law, do away with the present road department and establish a commission consisting of three men to receive $10,000 per year. These commissioners are granted the power to establish a system of interstate roads, to dictate the width of the roads and the materials of which they shall be constructed, as well as the plan of construction. Under the present law the State road department initiates the location of the highways in their several States. Do we want to take this power from our State road department and vest it in a commission here at Washington? Do we want to substitute a strictly interstate system for our present interstate and intercounty system? Do we want to create a "tourist" system of roads or strengthen and build up our present "farm-to-market" system? Do we want to destroy the "producers-to-consumers" system and install a "joy-rider" system?

All of the propaganda we receive advocating the Townsend system and the editorials appearing in the great newspapers of the great cities of the country advocating the Townsend plan appear to have two thoughts in their minds. One is that the Townsend plan provides a commission, and this commission will lay out these roads from coast to coast and to the great cities of the country, providing a great highway at least 20 feet wide for the tourists of the country. They want to take care of the joy riders of America. They nowhere seem concerned about the farmers getting their products to market or the millions of consumers in these cities having the benefit of these products. It is said that one-half of the perishable products of the country are lost every year because of lack of roads to get these products to the market. As expressed by the President, the first consideration in getting good roads is to aid the commerce of the country. The Townsend plan is the same "bill" that the American Automobile Association has been trying to give to American taxpayers for many years. The present Townsend plan merely sugarcoats the pill a little bit. Senator TOWNSEND is a splendid gentleman and intensely interested in good roads. I think he wants to help the good roads cause all he can. The American Automobile Association and the American Automobile Chamber of Commerce are located in the great cities of the country. Their viewpoint is a few great highways from coast to coast. They have done much for the cause of good roads, but their viewpoint is wrong. I would rather follow the viewpoint of the road builders of the several States and the farm organizations of the several States. They see the great necessity of connecting these rural communities and the producers with the cities of the country.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION. I will.

Mr. HILL. Is not this the so-called Dowell bill?

Mr. ROBSION. Yes; this bill contains all of the provisions of the Dowell bill and Phipps bill, with some good amendments protecting the States.

Mr. HILL. Is not the bill advocated by the good roads commission of Maryland?

Mr. ROBSION. Yes; every State highway organization in America is backing this bill.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Is the gentleman sure that the highway commission of Virginia has indorsed this bill?

Mr. ROBSION. The president of the American Highway Associations, consisting of the State highway commissions, engineers, and officials of the 48 States and their representatives advise us that the highway officials of practically every State in the Union are back of this bill and want this bill.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] states that this will compel the change of the State constitutions. Some States will have to change their constitutions perhaps to meet the requirements of the Federal Government, but they are given more than three years to make this change and will receive Federal aid during this time. It will require more States to change their constitutions if the Townsend plan is adopted. The President has clearly indicated that he would not approve further appropriations for Federal aid unless the State is made the unit in dealing with the Federal Government instead of the counties of the several States, and unless the State would provide a fund for the maintenance of these roads when once constructed. It is to the interest of all of us that when we build a good road that it be maintained. It is a foolish policy to build a road and then let it go to pieces. "A stitch in time saves nine" is a good policy in regard to roads.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION. I will.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman speaks of those who favor the Townsend bill. Why does not the present system work all right?

Mr. ROBSION. I might say that the Federal Highway Department, the highway officials of the 48 States, the American farm bureaus and associations, and the President himself, urge the present law to be amended and strengthened.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION. I will.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Was it not the opinion of the experts who came before our committee that the counties or other subdivisions of the State could contribute funds to the State in order to provide a fund to secure Federal aid and to maintain the roads built under Federal aid?

Mr. ROBSION. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. And that would meet the objection of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. ROBSION. The county can contribute funds. This bill makes the State the unit in dealing with the Federal Government, and it is up to the State to secure the funds from that Federal aid and to provide maintenance in such way as the State may desire.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It says that it shall provide State funds each year. It does not say county funds.

Mr. ROBSION. No. The State brings the county funds into the State treasury. This bill merely makes the State the unit instead of the county in dealing with the Federal Government. It could not be any other way. The Federal Government can not make these contracts or look to more than 3,000 counties in the Nation for the maintenance and protection of these Federal roads. This is a State matter and should be handled by the State.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] says he is for the farmers and for good roads. He says in his speech here to-day that he is against this bill and intended to vote against this bill, and he is against the present Federal aid law. His vote, then, will record him against good roads in this country. I would rather follow the statement of our leader from Ohio, the President, when he says that Federal aid is a wise policy and has come to stay than to take the statement of my friend from Ohio [Mr. BEGG]. The gentleman from Ohio would vote against this good roads bill. Did he not a few weeks ago record his vote in favor of $340,000,000 to help the railroads of this country [applause], and did he not record his vote for hundreds of millions to war contractors in this country, and other billions for the railroads? The farmers of America, the business people of America, and the common people of America want road legislation, and they need it. They want it more than anything else.

The people of this country would rather pay out money for good roads than any other thing we could appropriate money for, except to help the disabled soldiers of the country. I hope every man here will support this bill, because the farmers want it, the Federal highway officials want it, the road officials of all of the States want it, and it is the very best bill, I think, that can be brought out under the circumstances. [Applause.]

ROAD SYSTEMS WOULD BE DESTROYED.

If we should adopt the Townsend plan, what effect would that have on the road system that has already been laid out and partly constructed in the 48 States of the Union? The Townsend plan contemplates just a few interstate roads. The commission at Washington lays out this system of roads. They can and will disregard and ignore, in my judgment, the interstate and intercounty system of roads that have been laid out in each State. These systems in the several States approved by the Federal highway department have been partly built; contracts have been let for other portions of these systems. State constitutions and laws have been changed and made to provide funds to build the entire system with Federal aid. This system of roads will serve every congressional district in the Nation. To cut down this system and to destroy it after we have spent five years and millions of dollars in building it up would be next to a crime. This bill merely amends the present law and proposes to go forward and perfect and construct and provide maintenance for the systems of roads laid out in the 48 States.

TWO PER CENT OR 98 PER CENT.

By actual demonstration it has been shown that less than 2 per cent of the road travel of the country is interstate. The other 98 per cent is intercounty. Our bill has in mind the 98 per cent of travel in the county and within the States themselves as well as the 2 per cent that travels from one State to another. The Townsend plan with its interstate system would take care of the 2 per cent of travel and ignore the other 98 per cent of travel. The Townsend plan would furnish a hard road at least 20 feet wide for the tourists and joy riders from coast to coast, but it would sadly disappoint those who want a system of roads, "farm to market" and "producer to consumer" in character.

JOY RIDERS' ROAD OR FARMERS AND BUSINESS MEN'S ROAD.

Our bill by express terms provides for an interstate and intercounty system of highways that when once constructed will bring a good hard-surfaced road to at least 90 per cent of the people of the United States and within 2 miles of any such road. It is a great thought to me to contemplate such a system. Transportation is one of the great items of cost to the consumer. If we can cover our country with a network of good roads so that products of the country can be brought to the markets quickly and cheaply and so that where products are to be moved not more than 100 miles trucks can deliver the farm products or merchants products from producer to consumer in less time and less expense than it would require even to load these products on the train, it will mean much to the country. Water transportation, railroad transportation, should be joined up with every community of the Nation by means of good roads. Such a system of roads is contemplated by this bill, but would be impossible under the Townsend plan. The people want and must have an interstate and intercounty system and not merely an interstate system of highways. I trust that every friend of good roads will cast his vote for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNN] in opposition to the bill.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the Congress, this bill, reported from the Roads Committee, seeks to perpetuate and continue the roads-bill provisions that were reported January 6, 1916. I want to call your attention to the fact that that bill reported January 6, 1916, was reported from a committee composed of 14 Democrats and 7 Republicans. This bill is reported from a committee composed of 14 Republicans and 7 Democrats. Now, I want to ask an economy Congress what it thinks of some of these provisions.

In the first place, 3 per cent of the original appropriation of $275,000,000 was allowed for administrative expenses, amounting to over $8,000,000. This bill also allows the sum of 3 per cent of future appropriations.

It says that no State shall receive less than one-half of 1 per cent of any appropriation. That makes the bill more unfair—and it never was a square deal—because a few States will receive twice as much as any other State, taking the pro rata on the former bill. It also excepts 14 public-land States, so called, where the Government practically pays for building roads on public lands, which will be for the advantage of the rest of the State.

There is another thing about it as to the maintenance project that I wish to call your attention to. It says:

> To maintain the rural post roads constructed under the provisions of this act shall be the duty of the States. If at any time the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that any road in any State constructed under the provisions of this act is not being properly maintained, he shall give notice of such fact to the highway department of such State, and if within 100 days from the receipt of said notice said road has not been put in a proper condition of maintenance by the State highway department, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall thereafter refuse to approve any project for road construction in said State until such road has been put in a condition of proper maintenance, and if within 100 days from the receipt of said notice the said road has not been put in a proper condition of maintenance, then the Secretary of Agriculture, in addition to such refusal to approve any further project for road construction in said State, shall proceed immediately to have such road put in a condition of proper maintenance by letting contract therefor and shall charge the costs thereof against the Federal funds allotted to such State.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN. No; I can not yield now. It further provides that upon reimbursement by the State of the amount expended by the Federal Government that money so returned shall be turned into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts. When will that be paid?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DUNN. No; I can not. There is another item here that I would ask the legal talent of the House to pass upon. It provides that no payment of any money apportioned under this act shall be made on any project until such statement of the project and plans and specification and estimate therefor shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture. Can he pay out money in advance before any construction is begun merely upon the recommendation of a highway commission?

It seems a singular thing to me that this legislative bill should be taken up at this extra session, when we are so busy with other matters, or should be. One hundred and fifty million dollars still remain in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, to be met by appropriations of $200,000,000 from the different States. I submit that in these times of financial stringency, if they can use that money within a year or two, $350,000,000 is a goodly sum for this country to spend on good roads. Nothing is said about the maintenance of those roads. Those States have about as much as they can do to maintain the roads they have already built if they will put them in proper shape, and they should not prepare now for as large an appropriation as they can get, to add to the already large sum available in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture. I submit this is not a proper time to pass this bill. This bill is a legislative bill which will prevent points of order being made against items for road appropriations that are hereafter asked for in this House. I have been against it from the start. I never thought the Shackleford bill was a square deal, and I do not think it is now. I submit these ideas for your consideration, and I ask you to give thought to them.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman says it is not fair. I wish he would tell in what respect.

Mr. DUNN. I have not the time. If the gentleman would give me more time I would do it.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I submit that the gentleman has not used up his eight minutes and he has some time left.

Mr. DOWELL. In what respect is this apportionment unfair?

Mr. DUNN. The Middle States and the Eastern States pay from two to four times as much as other States who get their allotments. The bill should be a 50–50 proposition, or the amount should be prorated according to assessed valuation instead of according to the area.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman's objection is that his own State pays more than it should pay?

Mr. DUNN. I object to it on behalf of the Middle and the Eastern States. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used seven minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, on first blush I thought that this was a pretty good bill, but after reading it again and again I have become convinced that it is one of the most vicious pieces of legislation that has been presented to this House since I have been a Member, and I want to warn those Members of this House who expect to go along and vote for this bill to revert back to the constitution and the laws of their States before they make up their minds they are going to vote for this bill. I am not going to vote for this bill for various reasons, but one of the principal reasons is that I am not going to vote for any bill that will change the policy of my State that has been going on in these matters under the present law, and many other constitutions of different States of the Union provide also that the legislature of the State shall not vote money for internal improvements. My State provides that. Now, the State highway commission of my State deals with the counties of that State, and before my State can participate in Federal aid under this bill the Congress of the United States is going to coerce that State into amending its constitution and reverse its whole policy with regard to those matters. I am getting sick and tired of the Federal Government everlastingly sticking its hands into the affairs of my State and I am against any more building up of bureaus and of bureaucracy in Washington to reach out into the different States and tell the people of those States what they shall and what they shall not do. [Applause.] One of the greatest issues in this country is coming within the next few years, and it is going to be as to whether or not the individual citizens of the several States of this land are capable in some way of managing at least a small portion of their own business [applause] instead of having to run to Washington every time they want to know whether we can or whether we can not do a thing.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. If I understand this section 2, it means if our people should decline to amend our constitution so as to turn over to the legislature the power to appropriate this money, why after that we can never participate?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is entirely true. Not one dollar we pay into the Treasury can be apportioned to the State of Texas unless we amend our constitution. I am opposed to this. I never expect to vote while I am here to create another commission or bureau in Washington to stick its hands into the people's business. I am tired of it, and my people are tired of it. I am talking about the idiotic policy that is carried out here in Washington all the time and carried out in this and similar bills. I do not think this bill will receive the two-thirds vote of the membership of this House if the Members understand it.

The State of Texas has been getting on splendidly with the law as it is now written. During the last two and one-half years the counties of Texas have voted $100,000,000 for roads. The Federal aid has amounted to $16,000,000. This amount has been definitely allotted by our highway commission to different counties of the State. What we need to do here is not to pass more law but to have more money appropriated under the law as it is now written.

I understand there are 17 States that have the county system of road construction as we have in Texas. For one I shall not agree that before my State participates in this fund it shall be compelled to amend its constitution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I was raised on the farm and have spent most of my life in rural communities. I, therefore, know the disadvantages of poor roads.

Before Congress enacted any law authorizing Federal aid for the construction of public highways I became a candidate for Congress upon a platform declaring that I favored liberal appropriations for such purpose. Upon entering Congress I obtained membership on the Roads Committee, where I have since remained, and advocated better road facilities and liberal appropriations, which in a measure have at last been realized.

There are those who oppose appropriation for such purpose and contend that it makes an unequal distribution of burden upon the States. They illustrate by saying that New York, in proportion to population, pays something like twenty times as much for the support of the Federal Government as do some other States, and that, therefore, it is not just to force the State of New York to contribute for national construction of roads. The reasoning does not appeal to me. It is the same old argument to which the man of wealth has always resorted when called upon to make a larger public contribution than was required of his neighbor. Upon this theory such men have opposed the public-school systems and other public improvements of which they were not the chief beneficiaries. It is neither sound in reasoning nor just in principle.

I think it is a well-recognized fact that the cost of transportation is a part of the cost of production. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] who waxed so eloquent upon contributions made by New York and Ohio, might do well to remember that the States of Georgia, Montana, and others have contributed millions of dollars for river and harbor improvements in New York and Ohio. Why? Because they recognized it as being necessary and as a part of the transportation system of the country, beneficial to the farmers in every section of the United States.

There are animals down in Georgia that feed on acorns; they never look up to see from where the acorns fall. The logic of some men reminds me of those animals. They seem never to know from where their acorns fall. [Applause.]

The Federal Government has contributed billions of dollars for harbor improvements in New York and other cities of that section. A large portion of the funds contributed by the Government were collected from citizens of distant States who never saw New York. We might with equal plausibility say that, as a taxing proposition, it was unfair to tax the citizens of other States for harbor improvements in New York, but I do not so contend, nor do I believe such to be the case. New York is the gateway through which imports pass for distribution among consumers in other States. It is through this city that a large portion of the articles grown on the farms of the various States and manufactured in the great industrial centers of the country pass for export. Therefore the citizens of all the States are vitally interested in providing adequate facilities at New York for the proper handling and transportation of such commodities. Upon this principle they have paid tribute to the Federal Government to be used in improvements at New York for more than a hundred years; they have done so willingly and upon a sound principle of business policy. If it is necessary for the great harbors of the country to be improved at public expense and great merchant marines to be constructed at public cost to aid those engaged in transportation, is it not equally proper for the roads that run from farm to market and to the various points of transportation to be improved at public cost? Yet when we ask for a small pittance to be spent upon the highways of the country to insure adequate transportation facilities to the farmer, we are met with opposition from those we have served for more than a hundred years.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that it is my privilege to champion the cause of the man in the rural community and to be instrumental in giving him a good road to his farm, his market, his school, and his church. The farmers are entitled to good roads, and no matter from where the necessary funds may be gathered

I shall feel that he has already paid his part in some other enterprise. [Applause.]

No legislation has been enacted by Congress in recent years of a more constructive character or of more practical benefit to the masses than the present Federal-aid road system. It has met with such general approval that it is now regarded as a permanent policy of the Government. The comprehending business man of the city quickly realized its advantage and is no less a friend to the system than the man who resides on the highway improved. The question is not, shall we retain the system, but it is what can we do to improve it and how far shall we extend it?

The system has been in operation less than five years and suffered the handicap of nearly two years of war. Let us see what has been done. We began with $75,000,000, to be apportioned among the several States, and to be expended within a period of five years, as follows:

First year	$5,000,000
Second year	10,000,000
Third year	15,000,000
Fourth year	20,000,000
Fifth year	25,000,000

The system was regarded with so much favor that in February, 1919, we appropriated an additional $200,000,000 and thus made available for the next year $95,000,000, and for the fiscal year of 1921, $100,000,000. During this short period, with all the hindrances of war and panic, Federal aid has been extended to all the States and operation has in every case proven satisfactory and successful. With few exceptions, each of the 48 States have established State highway departments, and have inaugurated splendid systems for highway construction and improvements, which they regard among the most important divisions of State government.

During the period of Federal aid there has been completed under such construction 5,681 miles of road at a total cost of $84,342,878, of which amount $38,260,296 was Federal aid. There are 17,529 miles now under construction, which will cost $301,843,252. Of this amount $127,593,306 will be Federal aid. Fifty per cent of this work is complete, and hence we have an equivalent of 14,445 miles now completed.

A recent report made by the highway department of Georgia to the governor of that State discloses that by December next the board expects to have completed:

Two hundred and ninety miles of paving, at a cost of $8,000,000.
Eight hundred and ninety miles of top soil and sand clay roads, at a cost of $7,000,000.
Fifty or more permanent steel and concrete bridges, at a cost of $2,500,000.
Representing a total of $18,000,000.

The paving betterments if placed end to end would comprise a continuous highway from the Tennessee nearly to the Florida line, and the sand clay improvement would give three continuous highways across the State from east to west. The investment in bridges includes no less than 10 major structures from 1,000 to 2,300 feet long across the large streams of middle and south Georgia. This completed work will be taken under permanent maintenance.

Under construction all contracts are supervised by a resident engineer in charge and are repeatedly visited and inspected by the district engineer and also by general inspectors and Federal engineers.

It is pleasant to have participated in the formation of legislation so beneficial to the masses, but I regret that, in spite of such good results, sinister influences are at work to destroy the system. The latest effort finds expression in the Townsend bill, recently reported by the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

I wonder if Members realize the efforts that are being made to deprive the States of self-government. The Townsend bill seeks to destroy the present system of Federal aid and to substitute another which may be properly termed a system of State aid to the Federal Government.

The proposed system denies to the States the right to select, designate, and establish roads upon which Federal-aid funds may be used. It denies to the States Federal aid in the construction of all intrastate and intercounty highways, and only permits the use of such funds upon interstate highways. It proposes to establish a system of interstate roads, forming a part of a transcontinental system, supposed to meet the military needs of the Nation, but which in fact will only serve to create great national boulevards over which the idle rich and roaving sightseers may glide. It proposes to give absolute authority of designation, selection, and establishment of roads to three commissioners located in Washington, each on a salary of $10,000 per annum. These men, with little or no knowledge of local conditions, and perhaps caring less, are to be empowered to say what roads shall or shall not be constructed in Georgia and other States. Why should the Government be given the supreme authority? The Government may cooperate in construction on a basis of not more than 50 per cent, but it can never be charged with maintenance, and hence can not be equally interested. The present law provides for cooperation upon a basis of not more than 50 per cent, but under the more than four years of Federal aid the Government has contributed less than 43 per cent of the total cost of construction and nothing for maintenance. It has never been an equal partner in road construction, and it can never be, either under the present or the proposed system.

The proposed system not only prohibits Federal aid in the construction of such highways but provides that Navy and military officers may be detailed by the President for duty in the construction of such highways. I do not understand how a naval officer would be specially qualified for such enterprise. I imagine he would be as much out of place as would a sea turtle on a mountain top. Probably half of the nearly 18,000 Army officers now on the Government pay roll could be thus detailed without serious impairment of the military service or the safety of the Republic, but I am not sure such officers would find the private in the civilian labor brigade as submissive to commands as are those whom they now command, nor am I sure that such an experiment would prove beneficial to the country. I am unwilling, by my vote, to say that the roads from farm to market—forming a great system of intercounty and interstate highways—shall not be improved by Federal aid, and I will never willingly surrender such right of the common people. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Speaker, it would require the possession of some temerity on the part of one to speak in favor of this measure if the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] were treated seriously by me, coming, as I do, from one of those States which would have its roads built, as the gentleman would have us believe, by the taxpayers of Ohio.

I sincerely regret, Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, that the gentleman would discuss the measure now before us as a class or sectional proposition. I am glad that I have the opportunity of serving in a body in which the farmers have so many friends. I have heard many expressions of friendship for the toilers of this Nation during my brief service in this body, and I only wish that the votes recorded here were always in accord with those expressions.

I would be in favor of this bill were it a benefit only to the agricultural class of this country, but the building of good roads is in no sense a class or sectional issue. There is, in my humble judgment, no legislation it is possible to enact which will be of more far-reaching and enduring value to the whole people of this country than that which we are now considering—the continuing of aid by the Federal Government to the States in building good roads.

This bill makes no special concessions to the people of the rural districts, but is for the benefit of all classes. To the extent that the Government can afford to give, there is no place where we can invest the taxes of the people, wherever they may reside or whatever their occupation in life may be, to greater advantage than on the public highways.

The Federal Government is committed to the policy of appropriations for building public roads. The only question now to decide is whether the law we are now operating under, with a few amendments, shall be followed or whether another system shall be adopted. This Congress will have to decide whether the Secretary of Agriculture, through the Bureau of Public Roads, will continue the work that is generally so admirably handled or if it shall be taken from the departments and put into the hands of a commission composed of three members appointed by the President, and at a salary of $10,000 a year each.

The Townsend bill provides for three commissioners instead of the director of roads, and the commissioners are required primarily to establish a system of interstate highways. Under the present law the roads are projected by the local authorities in each State and the money spent under their supervision.

Do you want the location of roads in your States selected by commissioners here in Washington or do you want your State highway officials to have that right?

Do you want no roads to receive Federal aid except transcontinental and interstate roads or do you want your intercounty roads to receive a portion of this aid? Under the bill the funds derived from the Government would be expended on roads, both interstate and intercounty, selected by your State authorities. Under the Townsend bill all the money will be used on transcontinental highways, these highways being selected by commissioners here in Washington.

I am strongly and unalterably opposed to the building of great transcontinental highways at the expense of the producers and consumers of this Nation.

If you want to do something of real and lasting benefit to these people, build your farm-to-market roads first, because farm-to-market roads enlarge the area of cultivation and feed the long-distance traffic of the railways, whereas transcontinental traffic by highway is useful only to an inconsiderable part of the citizenship.

Mr. William Edens, president of the Illinois Highway Improvement Association, said that 2 per cent is interstate and that 98 per cent represents the everyday use of the roads by local people. He is opposed to the Townsend plan, though he says he loves CHARLEY TOWNSEND. I am firmly of the opinion that we should not accede to those who are clamoring for transcontinental routes, because that does not solve the economic problem. Rather should we do everything possible to enable the farmers to get their produce to the market at the least possible cost, thereby benefiting them and at the same time the consumers of the country.

It was well stated by Mr. Silver, representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation, when he said:

> We have no use for railroads, river and harbor improvements, wharf facilities, or a merchant marine until the products have been transported from the farms to the markets. If we do not get over that first link, or if we have to get over it at too great a cost, it is something that we can not pick up again. It is something that must be passed on in some way or other to the other end.

It might be said here that this bill has the unqualified indorsement of the American Association of State Highway Officials and the American Farm Bureau Association.

The Federal aid to good roads has done much to encourage road building in the States; but some Members of this House talk as if the Government were building all the roads. This is not true at all. A comparatively small per cent of the money expended for this purpose comes from that source.

The people of the several States are taxing themselves until it hurts for this purpose. In my own State, Louisiana, there has been written into the new State constitution just adopted provisions which will result in the raising of $5,000,000 annually for roads. In addition the parishes of the State are voting bond issues in large amounts. In some of the parishes the amounts raised under bond issues are much greater than that received from the Federal Government in one year for the whole State.

There is no public demand for substituting the Townsend national highway bill system for the present post-road and farm-to-market system in vogue under the present law in the various States.

It is true that certain automobile associations in large cities are advocating and urging the passage of the Townsend national highway bill, but your attention is invited to the fact that 90 per cent of the commerce of this country, in the raw and manufactured state, moves over the dirt roads and public highways of the country.

Operating under this law, Federal aid to States in constructing post roads and farm-to-market roads will serve the needs of many millions more of the American people than would the Townsend bill; therefore this bill should become a law.

Permit me to say that the present law under which Federal aid has been advanced has proved a great incentive to road building. In each State road building has gone forward rapidly during the last five years. This plan has been indorsed by the great majority of the witnesses appearing before the Committee on Roads.

The State highway commissions, in the main, are satisfied with the present plan of Federal aid for road building. State organizations have been formed under statutory enactments in the various States and are working in concert with the Federal Government under the present road law, and I appeal to the Members of this House who have at heart the interests of the tillers of the soil and the consumers in our great cities to vote for this measure.

I am glad, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that of the entire membership of this House there are only a few who have a narrow view of this question. The broad-minded business man from the East and those who represent the great cities of this country realize that by aiding in legislation which will benefit the farmers of the country they will be doing that which will greatly benefit their own constituencies, for the consumers in the cities must depend on these splendid farmers for food on which to subsist, and the great manufacturers must sell their products to the farmers of the South and West, and just in proportion as the farmers are prosperous will they also prosper.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, permit me to say that one must be shortsighted, indeed, and have a narrow vision not to realize that the cities can not prosper and grow unless the producers of this country are prosperous. I am glad that this Congress has so few within its membership who do not realize this fact.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE].

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Speaker, as the only Ohio member of the Committee on Roads, I rise in support of the bill and in opposition to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], who has just spoken in opposition to it.

If we do not pass this bill it means the defeat of further Federal aid in the construction of public highways, because the administration has made it clear that the present law must be amended by a provision requiring the States to see that Federal aid roads are properly maintained, and with that in view this bill carries a provision that each State must provide a State fund adequate for maintenance of Federal aid roads; and that such roads hereafter constructed through Federal aid shall be properly maintained.

In Ohio we have a law based on the same principle as is found here. People are encouraged, by reason of State aid, to construct roads that otherwise would remain unimproved. I venture to state that if roads are now or have been constructed in the district of the gentleman from Ohio that the State's aid partly comes from taxation paid by people who reside out of the county and district in which the improvement is being made.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CABLE. I can not yield.

If the principle of the law works well in Ohio, it should work just as well throughout the United States. The President has signified that taxes collected from the people by the Federal Government shall not be used for the construction of roads by Federal aid unless the construction is safeguarded by a good and proper maintenance law. To use the taxpayers' money to construct a good road and then stand by while it is torn down is waste.

The American Association of State Highway Officials, the State highway departments of practically every State in the Union, and many other road and farm associations have indorsed this bill, and if you fail to pass it, it will mean the abolishment of Federal aid and stop construction of roads that otherwise, without this aid, would not be built. I therefore ask you to support the measure. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration provides that the Federal Government shall continue its policy adopted in 1916 of assisting the States in the construction of a system of modern highways.

The bill makes certain amendments to the present law and certain additions that are intended to more clearly define the policy of the Federal Government and remove what difficulties experience has shown exist in the present law that militate against its administration. It is intended to conserve and safeguard the public funds and at the same time secure the best possible results to the largest number of people, especially those living in the rural communities.

The paramount feature of this bill, as well as the law under which we are now operating, is cooperation. Each and every State is required to establish a highway department—one that is satisfactory and acceptable to the Secretary of Agriculture. It provides that the Federal Government will deal only with States in the administration of the law. Provision is made to give three years for any State whose constitution or laws may have to be changed so as to give them time to make the necessary change to comply with the provisions of this act.

It also extends the provisions requiring the States to provide funds for maintenance, and penalizes those States which neglect or fail to keep in proper condition the roads that are aided in construction by the Federal Government. Provision is also made for highway research and investigation.

Each State is required to provide a definite plan or system of roads, interstate and intercounty in character, keeping in mind the needs of the Government in transporting mails, the marketing of farm products, transportation of merchandise, and the needs of the social life of the communities. In fact, a well-balanced system of roads that can be relied upon at all seasons, and be maintained so they can be traveled satisfactorily 365 days in the year.

The Secretary of Agriculture is also authorized to collect and disseminate useful information as to the construction and maintenance of highways, and as far as possible insure safety to those who use the roads.

UMI

This measure has the indorsement of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, who is recognized as being perhaps the highest authority on road building in the United States. Also the American Association of State Highway Officials, having a membership in practically all of the States in the Union, has heartily indorsed this bill. The United States Good Roads Association, with a membership in about all the States, and with 30 governors as vice presidents, met in Greensboro, N. C., April 18–23, 1921, and passed the following resolution:

Whereas the Federal and State cooperative road plan has resulted in the construction and improvement of thousands of miles of post roads and public highways, which directly benefit many thousands of American people; and

Whereas this plan has been indorsed by business men's leagues, chambers of commerce, farmers' unions, and other bodies interested in good roads; and

Whereas there is no public policy that will bless and benefit more people than that which is now being carried out in the construction of public roads in the various States of the Union: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we heartily indorse the Federal and State cooperative plan of road building now in practice, and we urge upon Congress the importance and necessity of continuing this work and avoiding a national calamity: to prevent this calamity we urge the Congress to appropriate $100,000,000 a year for a period of five years.

Whereas during the World War the Government of the United States extended loans to the allied nations in the sum of about $10,000,000,000; and

Whereas much is being said about the payment of this debt and disposition to be made of such moneys when paid; and

Whereas the construction and improvement of post roads and public highways in the United States would directly benefit more people than were this money used in any other way: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Congress is hereby requested to provide that said money, when collected from the allied nations, shall constitute the road fund and shall be used as Congress shall direct in building and improving post roads and public highways in the United States.

Also the American Farm Bureau Federation, which has organizations all over the United States, had a meeting in Washington, April 8 last, and passed the following resolution:

We earnestly approve the local building of "farm-to-market" highways by the use of Federal and State local funds. Until such roads are built we emphatically oppose the construction by the Federal Government of a few hard-surface transcontinental roads. Regardless of the character of roads which are built, an adequate amount of such funds should be provided for their maintenance and repair. We urge that the administration of Federal roads be in the hands of the United States Department of Agriculture.

Also many other road organizations and societies and farm associations have heartily indorsed the measure now under consideration.

This bill also provides for the limiting of the Federal funds to a system of roads designated by the State highway department of each State, but the Secretary of Agriculture shall have authority to approve, in whole or in part, the system designated or require any changes or modifications that the Secretary deems necessary.

The roads to be aided by the provisions of this act are divided into two classes; one the primary or interstate roads, which shall not exceed three-sevenths of the total mileage to be improved or to receive Federal aid, and the other, the secondary or intercounty, shall consist of the remainder that may receive Federal aid. Not less than 60 per cent of all the Federal money allotted to the States must be expended on the interstate or primary roads. The Secretary of Agriculture, in approving projects, is directed to give preference to those which will expedite the completion of an adequate and connected system of roads interstate in character.

I desire to call the attention of the House to another bill dealing with the subject of roads now pending in the Senate, known as the Townsend bill, some of the provisions of which are radically different from the provisions of the bill under consideration. Should the principles contained in the Townsend bill receive the sanction of Congress, in my opinion a very damaging blow would be struck to our entire road-building program.

The Townsend bill provides for a Federal commission, and gives it full authority to lay out and locate an interstate system of roads entirely. In other words, the Townsend bill means that the Federal funds will all be expended upon a system of interstate and transcontinental roads that will not meet the needs of agriculture and the business and commercial needs of the community, but will be used mainly by tourists, pleasure seekers, and joy riders. Many of the States, in my opinion, would refuse to cooperate and expend their funds under the provisions of an act of this kind.

It seems inconceivable that there can be advocates of a scheme to deprive the State highway departments of any voice in the location of roads in their own States in view of the fact that the officials of such departments are much more thoroughly familiar with local needs and local conditions than can possibly be a commission sitting in Washington. Any attempt of this kind, in my opinion, would result in the failure of the whole Federal-aid principle, because a commission in Washington, endeavoring to decide myriads of local controversies as to individual routes, would find itself engaged in solving neighborhood quarrels, and be unable to give the proper attention to the real purpose for which it was created—the building of roads.

Some days ago in the hearings conducted on the Townsend bill in the Senate, Gen. Pershing was called upon by the proponents of that measure. It was expected, of course, that he would give his indorsement and bestow his blessing upon the transcontinental, coast-to-coast system, a system that would place the road-building program entirely in the hands of the Federal Government, but much to the chagrin and astonishment of the friends of that measure, Gen. Pershing stated in substance that the first important need in road building was a system of roads that would enable the products of the farm to reach the market at the least expense and in the shorest time.

Agriculture being one of the chief basic industries of the country, and agriculture and roads being so closely related, there is no doubt in my mind that the administration of this law should be left to the Department of Agriculture. Why should we disturb a system that has produced such wonderful results and that is working so satisfactorily? What is more important to all the people of the United States than to have a successful, contented agricultural population? The hope of the future is wrapped up in the boys and girls, and they can not be kept on the farms in sufficient numbers under present conditions. Bad roads is perhaps the greatest handicap at this time with which the farmer has to contend. We hear much of "back to the farm" or "back to the country" movement. But that cry is futile and vain unless the ills that are driving the people from the country to the towns and cities are cured, and when that is done our boys and girls will remain on the farms. Once they leave and fall under the enchantments of city or town life it is almost impossible to ever get them to return to the country and become contented citizens again.

The States of the Union have practically all enacted laws to conform to the present plan of coöperation, and why have this plan upset and a commission created at heavy expense and begin the work all over again?

The work is now progressing according to a systematic program that in the end will connect into a complete system of roads throughout the country, the main highway of one State connecting with the main highway of another State. In this way we will have a system of interstate and intercounty roads that will meet the commercial, business, and social needs of the entire country. It is not commissions that are needed, but adequate enlargement of the present Bureau of Roads, fully equipped, with an appropriation sufficient to meet the pressing present and future needs, and the command of Congress should be to halt not but continue to go forward without delay until the program now under way is fully consummated.

Since the present Federal road law was enacted in 1916 there has been appropriated by the Congress of the United States, all told, $275,000,000, and of this amount $266,750,000 has been paid or apportioned to the States, and the residue, or 3 per cent, has been used for administrative purposes. The expenditure of this money has produced better results and brought more blessings and benefits and met with more general favor than any legislation that has been enacted since I have been a Member of this body. The moral effect has been even more helpful than the money appropriated, as it encouraged the States to take up the work in a progressive way, to create highway commissions, and set up administrative machinery for the successful construction of roads that would have been impossible without the great impetus which was given this movement by Federal aid and assistance.

In the State of North Carolina, which I have the honor in part to represent, when this law was enacted, we had no highway commission and our people felt that the load was too heavy for them to undertake to carry, but inspired and encouraged by the aid of the Federal Government we have established a highway commission, consisting of a chairman, who is one of the ablest business men in North Carolina, and nine associate commissioners, each and every one of whom is a man of high order of business ability. The State is divided into nine districts, with a commissioner to look after the interest of each district, so that no section of the State will be neglected and the money will be expended equitably and economically.

The road-building sentiment in our State has gained momentum to such an extent that the last general assembly was authorized and directed to sell bonds to the amount of $50,000,000 for road construction, in addition to what Federal funds may be procured. Provisions were also made for the maintenance of our system of roads, which guarantees that every mile of road that is constructed will be kept in condition to be utilized every day in the year. The spirit of road building and the determination to be done with muddy roads is so strong in North Carolina that it will never be stopped until we have a modern system of highways penetrating every section of the State and making proper connection with adjoining States and that will meet the needs of all our people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all those who speak on this bill may have the privilege of revising and extending their remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all those who speak on this bill may have the privilege of revising and extending their remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, will not the gentleman include in his request any who desire to be heard, because there has been only 40 minutes' debate?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I will include that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all Members who desire may have five legislative days in which to print their remarks, and that all those who speak on the bill may have the privilege of revising as well as extending their remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Reserving the right to object, is it to be confined to their own remarks?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; to be confined to their own remarks.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, why include the words "revising their remarks"? I do not understand there is a right for a man to revise his remarks and insert a new speech.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is simply to revise the remarks as well as extend them. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] has five minutes remaining.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I was much interested in the remarks make by my friend from Ohio [Mr. BEGG]. I was interested particularly in the figures he quoted, showing how Ohio was paying, through the Federal taxes collected in that State, many more dollars for roads throughout the country than other States which are receiving Federal aid. It was interesting to me to note that the State of Michigan, from which I come, is in precisely the same predicament. We all know that the matter of obtaining taxes applies to States in the same way as it applies to individuals. The man who is lucky and has much of the world's goods, the man who is wealthy, is the man who pays large taxes. The man who pays little has little wealth. If Ohio and Michigan and other more fortunate States are paying much of the taxes of the United States to-day it is because much of the wealth is concentrated there. It is largely concentrated in the great industrial cities, where the men who toil in the mills and factories are as vitally interested in the economic solution of the problem of hauling farm produce to market at the least possible cost as are the farmers themselves, and I maintain that the people living in the wealthier cities should bear their fair share of this cost of improving the farm-to-market roads of the country. And be it to the everlasting credit of the people living in my district that not once has any man, be he rich or poor, ever protested to me against the appropriation of Federal funds for this purpose.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Ohio, on account of its wealth, is paying more than Wyoming for the maintenance of the Federal courts. Should we abolish the courts for that reason?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Certainly not. It would be just as reasonable for my friend from Ohio to demand part of the Navy be put on the Great Lakes because the State of Ohio is located on those Lakes and pays a large part of the taxes which support the Navy, or that a part of the Government buildings and departments be moved into his State because Ohio pays more taxes than the District of Columbia. [Applause.] The position is untenable.

I was glad to hear the gentleman say he is interested in farm-to-market roads. I am interested in that also. I have always been in favor of legislation that would assist in the construction of roads of this character. When I was a member of the original Roads Committee of this House in my former service here, I was in favor of seeing every farm road in the country improved by Federal aid. I am still in favor of such legislation, and while this bill does not provide that this shall be done in the immediate future, it does provide that a certain amount of work shall be done on the farm-to-market roads and that eventually every such road can be improved with the assistance of Federal aid. This bill preserves the principle involved in my theories concerning Federal aid in the construction of roads, and I am heartily in favor of the bill. It also perfects the legislation now upon the statute books, under which such wonderful progress has been made in the construction of the roads of the country during the past three years.

I do not see why one man who has been fortunate enough in years past to have bought a farm along some road, which may afterwards be arbitrarily declared to be a Federal-aid road by some individual or commission, should have preference over some man who has not been so fortunate. The thing I want to see in this country is the improvement of roads to such an extent, and with Federal aid, if you please, that every farmer, I do not care who he is, how far he lives from his nearest market, or be he rich or poor, shall be able to haul his produce to market over the best possible roads at the least possible cost, and that is the only economic principle involved in this question before us to-day. [Applause.]

There is only one thing that can justify the expenditure of Federal moneys in improvements in the various States, and that is the solution of an economic problem. The economic problem involved in the extension of Federal aid in the construction of roads in the various States is that of enabling the farmer to reduce his cost of hauling farm produce to market from 33 cents per ton-mile, the cost of hauling this produce over unimproved roads, to 16 cents per ton-mile, the cost of hauling the same product to market over improved roads. It is estimated 1,000,000,000 of tons of farm produce and merchandise are hauled over the farm roads of the country each year. The average haul over these roads is a fraction more than 10 miles, and if the roads of this country can be improved to such an extent that every farmer, no matter where he may live, may haul his produce to market over good roads, there is an economic saving to the Nation of $1,700,000,000 per year. This, to my mind, is the thing that justifies the expenditure of Federal moneys in the construction of farm-to-market roads.

It is a fact that intercity and interstate motor-truck transportation of merchandise is growing larger and larger each year, hastened, of course, by the exorbitant freight rates charged by the railroads, and this situation should be given consideration. It is not, nor can it ever become, of primary importance, for the reason that more tonnage is hauled over our country roads than will ever be hauled over our steam roads, over our waterways, or by truck from city to city and from State to State combined. So I maintain that legislation which provides for expenditure of Federal money upon intercity and interstate highways to the exclusion of farm-to-market roads is an economic mistake and not justified by existing conditions.

During the hearings just completed by our House Roads Committee we have heard representatives of the highway departments of all the States. We have also heard representatives of good roads organizations, automobile associations, and so forth. Not one word of criticism was offered as to the present handling of this great question by any of the witnesses. In fact everything which was said was a tribute to the efficiency and the complete understanding with which the Bureau of Roads in the Department of Agriculture has functioned with the various State highway departments.

This bill provides that after the program of 7 per cent of the highways of the States, plans of which have been submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture by the various States have been approved, the Secretary can and shall continue to approve further plans for the further improvement of the farm-to-market roads. The law contemplates the carrying on of this work until such time as every farmer has been treated alike in the matter of improving the roads.

Could I have had my way about it I should have written upon the statute books a law which would have improved the farm-to-market roads first. As these were extended, they would automatically have taken care of our intercity and interstate roads. Because, as I said before, the problem of hauling farm produce to market at the least possible cost is a question in which every man, woman, and child of this great country is interested. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. The question is on agreeing to the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. If it is in order, I desire to make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in the affirmative——

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Texas ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 266, nays 77, not voting 88, as follows:

SUPPLEMENTAL TO THE NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 7294, with the amendments that are on the copy that I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7294) supplemental to the national prohibition act.

Be it enacted, etc., That the words "person," "commissioner," "applicant," "permit," "regulation," and "liquor," and the phrase "intoxicating liquor," when used in this act, shall have the same meaning as they have in title 2 of the national prohibition act.

SEC. 2. That only spirituous and vinous liquor may be prescribed for medicinal purposes, and all permits to prescribe and prescriptions for any other liquor shall be void. No physician shall prescribe, nor shall any person sell or furnish on any prescription, any vinous liquor that contains more than 24 per cent of alcohol by volume, nor shall anyone prescribe or sell or furnish on any prescription more than one-fourth of 1 gallon of vinous liquor, or any liquor that contains more than one-half pint of alcohol, for use by any person within any period of 10 days. No physician shall be furnished with more than 100 prescription blanks for use in any period of 90 days, nor shall any physician issue more than that number of prescriptions within any such period unless on application therefor he shall make it clearly apparent to the commissioner that for some extraordinary reason a larger amount is necessary, whereupon the necessary additional blanks may be furnished him. But this provision shall not limit the quantity of liquor unfit for beverage purposes that may be prescribed, sold, or furnished on a prescription.

If the commissioner shall find that any article enumerated in subdivisions b, c, d, or e of section 4 of title 2 of the national prohibition act is being purchased for use as a beverage, or for intoxicating beverage purposes, he may require a change of formula of such article or cancel the permit for the manufacture of such article unless it is made clearly to appear to the commissioner that such use can only occur in rare or exceptional instances, but such action of the commissioner may by appropriate proceedings in a court of equity be reviewed, as provided for in section 5, title 2, of the national prohibition act.

No intoxicating liquor shall be imported into the United States, nor shall any permit be granted authorizing the manufacture of any vinous or spirituous liquor, save alcohol, until the amount of such liquor now in distilleries or other bonded warehouses shall have been reduced to a quantity that in the opinion of the commissioner will, with liquor that may thereafter be manufactured, be sufficient to supply the current need thereafter for all nonbeverage uses.

SEC. 3. That this act shall apply to the United States and to all territory subject to its jurisdiction, including the Territory of Hawaii and the Virgin Islands; and jurisdiction is conferred on the courts of the Territory of Hawaii and the Virgin Islands to enforce this act and the national prohibition act in such Territory and islands.

SEC. 4. That regulations may be made to carry into effect the provisions of this act. Any person who violates any of the provisions of this act shall be subject to the penalties provided for in the national prohibition act.

SEC. 5. That all laws in regard to the manufacture and taxation of and traffic in intoxicating liquor, and all penalties for violations of such laws that were in force when the national prohibition act was enacted, shall be and continue in force, as to both beverage and nonbeverage liquor, except such provisions of such laws that are directly in conflict with any provision of the national prohibition act; but if any act is a violation of such laws and also of the national prohibition act, a conviction for such act or offense under one shall be a bar to prosecution therefor under the other. All taxes and tax penalties provided for in section 35 of Title II of the national prohibition act shall be assessed and collected in the same manner and by the same procedure as other taxes on the manufacture or traffic in liquor.

If distilled spirits are lost by theft, accidental fire, or other casualty while in possession of a common carrier subject to the transportation act of 1920, or if lost by theft from a distillery or other bonded warehouse, and the person guilty of the theft has been convicted of the offense, and it shall be made to appear to the commissioner that such losses did not occur as the result of negligence, connivance, collusion, or fraud on the part of the owner or person legally accountable for such distilled spirits, no tax shall be assessed or collected upon the distilled spirits so lost, nor shall any tax penalty be imposed or collected by reason of such loss, but the exemption from the tax and penalty shall only be allowed to the extent that the claimant is not indemnified against or recompensed for such loss. This provision shall apply to any claim for taxes or tax penalties that may have accrued since the passage of the national prohibition act or that may accrue hereafter.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I demand a second.

Mr. CLASSON. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it has been agreed that there shall be 2 hours on a side instead of the usual 20 minutes on a side. The Chair thinks that the ordinary procedure to be followed is for the Chair to follow the same course that is adopted where there is 20 minutes on a side. The Chair would recognize some member of the committee to demand a second who is opposed to the bill.

Mr. CLASSON. I am a member of the committee and I am opposed to the bill and demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he should recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin to demand a second.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on the bill that passed the House just a few minutes ago the parliamentary situation resulted in two gentlemen on the majority side of the Chamber having control of the time. Whether it was the result of that or not, the fact is that the minority side of the House received during that debate of 40 minutes 8 minutes of time, 5 minutes of that time being yielded to a gentleman in favor and 3 minutes to one opposed. Now, the present question before us is not a party question. All efforts that have been made to make it a party question have failed. It seems to me that it should be arranged so that we can be assured of an equal division of time between those in favor and those against the measure, and that the political minority of the House should have its proper recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated to gentlemen who approached him for recognition that he would prefer to recognize a member of the minority inasmuch as the gentleman from Minnesota is on the majority side, but inasmuch as there is no member of the minority of the committee opposed to the bill, the Chair feels constrained to recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I hope the Chair did not understand me as making any complaint against the action of the Chair in that regard. I made the statement to see if there would not be some disposition to make an agreement whereby some one on this side of the Chamber could be given a certain amount of time in favor of the bill, which he could control, and some one on this side in opposition to the bill a certain amount of time which he could control. I would like to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas, Mr. SUMNERS, may control one hour of the time in favor of the bill and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SABATH, may control one hour of the time in opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request stated by the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of my colleague, who gave notice that he would likely demand a second and be accorded the time, whether he has more requests from the Democratic side than from the Republican side in opposition?

Mr. CLASSON. I have almost twice as many requests from the Republican side as I have from the Democratic side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that there are about as many on one side as on the other.

Mr. CLASSON. Let me say at the beginning that I would yield 30 minutes to that side, and perhaps later on I would yield more.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he would yield 45 minutes to this side, and the chairman of the committee would yield 45 minutes to this side—45 minutes to me in favor of the bill and 45 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] opposed to the bill?

Mr. CLASSON. I am willing to do that.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will do that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Wisconsin will yield 45 minutes of his time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] will yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Reserving the right to object, is not there some way to get an extra hour for debate. The House has not anything to do to-day. I ask unanimous consent that the time limit be extended one hour on a side, making six hours for general debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended to six hours. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to a second being considered as ordered?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy only a few minutes at this time to give some little idea of what we are trying to do by this bill. Some time ago the Attorney General rendered an opinion in which he held that beer and wine might be prescribed for medicinal purposes under the national prohibition act. He not only held that those liquors might be prescribed, but he practically held that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has very little control over the subject of permits. It was to meet that situation that the bill was introduced, and also to take care of some matters that had developed during the year and a half that this law has been in force. I drafted the legislation and the Judiciary Committee reported it to the House after it had been amended by that committee. The day before we reported it the Supreme Court rendered a decision which materially affects our power under the old revenue laws. When we passed the national prohibition act we sought to preserve the old revenue laws that had been in force for a great many years and which we deemed very necessary for the purpose of taking care of the manufacture and traffic in intoxicating liquor. After we had reported the bill we went before the Rules Committee and sought to obtain a rule, but that committee thought we had too many things in the bill and finally refused to give us the rule.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], chairman of the Committee on Rules, then introduced this bill, which is a copy of four sections of my original bill. That bill came to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee promptly reported it with several amendments. Since then we have added two additional amendments.

Section 1 simply repeats some of the definitions now in the national prohibition act.

Section 2 takes care of the subject of prescribing liquor, not only beer, but wine and all spirituous liquors. It writes into the law some of the regulations that have been in force. It does not aim to limit beyond what has been the custom during the last year the right to prescribe spirituous liquors. It allows 1 quart of wine to be prescribed, but it can not be prescribed in addition to a pint of spirituous liquor, but an amount equal to one-half a pint of alcohol may be prescribed, whether of wine or spirituous liquor.

Section 2 is a provision that seeks to give further control over patent medicines, extracts, and things of that sort. Certain of those are being sold quite largely by the drink in many quarters, sold just the same as whisky was sold, at 15 cents or some other price per glass. The test in the law as to what may be made and sold is rather technical and scientific. We seek to apply in this provision a practical test. If it is being used, if it is upon the market as a liquor, as a beverage, we say that there should be some power to stop it. The last paragraph of the second section gives the commissioner power to prevent an increase in the supply of spirituous and vinous liquor that may be manufactured and imported beyond what may be necessary for the purpose of taking care of nonbeverage uses. There are about 40,000,000 gallons or a little less than that of spirituous liquor in bonded warehouses now, an amount that is very much larger than anything that will be needed for some time if it is used legitimately.

Section 3 simply makes this proposed law and the national prohibition act applicable to Hawaii and the Virgin Islands. The law is in force there, but their courts have no power to enforce it. This gives the courts of those Territories power to enforce the law.

Section 4 simply provides for a penalty.

Section 5 takes care of the decision of the Supreme Court to which I have just referred. It writes into the law what we supposed, at least everybody in this House so far as I know supposed, was the law at the time the prohibition act was enacted. It provides that the old statutes, except in so far as they are in conflict with the national prohibition act, shall remain in force and provides a method of assessing and collecting the taxes imposed under the national prohibition act.

The last paragraph of section 5 is designed to take care of a situation that has been created by reason of the enactment of the prohibition act. There has been a great deal of difficulty in keeping people from stealing liquor in transit and also from bonded warehouses. People who have lost liquor innocently and have been compelled to pay the taxes on such liquor have complained bitterly, and we seek in this to give them a remedy provided they show that they have not themselves been guilty of conniving in the loss or have been careless or negligent in some ways so that they can be blamed for it. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CLASSON. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the submission of the prohibition amendment. I am a member of the committee that framed the original Volstead bill and voted in the committee to liberalize the bill and joined in a minority report against it.

I voted on the floor of the House for all amendments to make the bill more liberal, and after they had all failed I voted for the bill.

When the President vetoed the bill I voted to sustain his veto. In all my votes on this measure I had the unqualified approval of at least one of the voters of my district and that was myself.

I voted against the constitutional amendment because I believed then, and I believe now, that the amendment had no more place in the fundamental law of this country than an amendment fixing the size of a man's hat or a woman's shoe; that the subject was one entirely for State control.

After the amendment was submitted and ratified it became a part of our law, and as such must be enforced.

I voted to liberalize the enforcement bill because I believed it was too drastic.

But when it came to the question of voting for or against the only enforcement act we could get, because I at all times believe in law enforcement, I voted for it.

I believed that war-time prohibition, at the time the Volstead law was enacted, when we were not at war, was the rankest kind of subterfuge and hypocrisy, and when President Wilson agreed with me and vetoed the bill because it combined war-time with constitutional prohibition I naturally voted to sustain my own position and his.

But I must confess that when I voted for the original Volstead enforcement bill I reached my limit, and I shall vote against this bill to supplement the national act. [Applause.] I hoped and partially believed that the people would make the best of the situation and accept the Volstead Act and put their moral influence behind its enforcement, but that hope has been disappointed.

The so-called enforcement of the Volstead Act would be a comedy if its cost did not make it almost tragic and its nonenforcement is becoming more marked and more expensive day by day. Naturally, those who are spending the people's money and being paid for its alleged enforcement are claiming a splendid success, but if every Member of this House will consult his own experience and observation he will know that while we may have prohibition, we have not abstinence nor even temperance. Brewing is becoming a daily and often a deadly art; the ability and desire to distill is growing greater with each ghastly experiment, and the doctors, bootleggers, and drug peddlers are supplementing the heroic efforts of the people to secure a "kick." You can not make people good by legislation, and you can not enforce a law if you have not implanted in the people a sense of moral wrong in its violation.

The American people do not regard the violation of this law as morally wrong. They consider its violation a game in which they are matching their wits against those of the enforcement officers; if they win they have a drink or a bottle; if they lose it is unfortunate but not wrong.

Many people are drinking spirituous liquor now and keeping it in their homes who had never touched, tasted, or handled it before and whose aversion to it could be overcome in no other way except by the country going dry. [Applause.]

I am not theorizing. I am talking from my own observation, and I believe that what is true in my field of observation is true in that of every other Member of the House.

The demand for liquor exists, and so long as it exists it is going to be supplied in one way or another. That is a situation that I believe we should recognize and meet. If we do not meet it, the people will continue to meet it in their own way, and that is not a good way.

But it is said that the people wanted prohibition; that they ratified the prohibition amendment. Well, now did they? When the amending resolution was before the House I was very much interested in an amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] providing that the question of ratification in the several States should be submitted to conventions called for that purpose. I voted for that amendment. That would have put the question squarely up to the people to elect members of that convention on the sole issue "for or against ratification." But the Moores amendment received only a handful of votes, and the question of ratification was submitted to the legislatures. I think I am right in saying that many legislatures were elected and some in session when the prohibition amendment was voted out by the House. But whether that be true or not, we all know that members of the legislatures were elected on many other issues than that of ratification of this amendment.

That was only one of the many things that the legislatures had to consider. The people never had an opportunity to vote directly on this question, nor even indirectly by voting for a representative upon the one issue of ratification or nonratification.

The fight then was between the saloons, brewers, and liquor interests on the one side and the Anti-Saloon League, the best organized force that this or any other country ever saw, upon the other. The fight now is by the people for the right of self-determination. [Applause.] They have taken this matter into their own hands; and the American people always get what they want, if they want it long enough and hard enough; certainly not to-day, perhaps not to-morrow, but eventually.

Personally I am dry. I might say with a dust accumulation of 12 years. I have had my own experience, which was sufficient. But I am not one of those whose kidneys are hurt by what some one else drinks. [Laughter and applause.] I would not repeal the Volstead law if I could. But I believe in the strictest kind of law enforcement—every law, for disrespect of one law invariably breeds disregard for others—and because I believe that the present law can not be enforced, I would amend it so that it might be. I believe that the saloon is gone for good, and properly so. I believe that light wine and beer can be manufactured and sold in this country, under proper regulations, to the mutual benefit of the Government and the people, benefiting the Government by the revenue derived, and the saving of a large part of the money now wasted in trying to enforce an impossible law and the people by giving those who want it a nutritious and healthful beverage in place of the health and reason destroying concoctions that some of them now consume. [Applause.]

For that reason I am opposed to the language of this bill, which forbids the prescribing of beer.

Under the national prohibition act, the former Attorney General ruled that beer might be prescribed by a physician as medicine. That opinion has never been tested in the courts and is recognized as good law by the proposed change in the enforcement act to prevent its being carried into effect. The first sentence of section 2 is to nullify the ruling of the Attorney General. The report states that the testimony before the committee was overwhelming that beer is not a medicine.

That statement is true, if one is to be overwhelmed by medical testimony. I have seen so much of it refuted by actual experience myself that I refuse to be overwhelmed or even slightly awed by it. Medicine is an overwhelmingly uncertain science. Surgery is more nearly sure, although sometimes its terms are rather confusing. For instance, an operation may be highly successful, although the funeral of the operatee follows very promptly thereafter.

Beer is like anything else that we take for relief from ills; if it helps, it helps; if it does not, it does not.

I know people who will take their solemn oaths that their lives were saved by drinking beer as a tonic. Perhaps they are mistaken. If they are, it simply shows that doctors have not a monopoly on making mistakes. Doctors have prescribed beer, I know, and have acted in good faith and gotten excellent results in doing it.

Doctors try many things and experiment much. After all, they are very like the tramp who drifted into one of our southern cities just before an epidemic of yellow fever. When the plague came there was a great shortage of doctors, and although he knew absolutely nothing of medicine, he thought it would be profitable to pretend that he was one. He determined to make notes of his cases and learn from experience. His first patient was a German, who begged continuously and piteously for sauerkraut, so the tramp prescribed it for him and he got well. The tramp noted in his book, "Sauerkraut will cure a Dutchman of yellow fever." His next patient was an Irishman. The tramp prescribed sauerkraut and the patient died. Then he added under his first entry, "But will kill an Irishman."

The doctors before the committee said that beer was not good as a medicine because of the alcohol that is in it, yet they prescribe whisky, with a good many more times the amount of alcohol, and call it good medicine. "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. CLASSON. No. It is argued that prescribing beer as a medicine would be a farce; that people would get it because they wanted it to drink whether they were sick or not. Perhaps they would. That would not alarm me at all. But if the prescribing of beer can be made any more of a farce than the prescribing of whisky has been made then there is no limit to the presentation of farces under the prohibition law.

Why this discrimination? We all know that people get whisky when they want it on prescription. Why not let the people who do not want or can not afford whisky have beer if they want it in the same way? Why favor the distillers over the brewers? If a little alcohol in beer is bad, then much more in whisky must be worse. Why favor the man who can afford whisky over the man who can afford only beer? The prescribing of beer may not be an ideal way to handle the situation. The prescribing of whisky certainly is not.

I favor the prescribing of beer because I believe it is a step in the right direction—helping to cure the present bad condition and tending to temperance and sobriety, pointing the way to a modification of the national act which will give back to the people a reasonable measure of liberty in the management of their own personal and intimate affairs and evolve a workable and enforceable law.

When we legislate for or against extremes we always injure the innocent who stand between those extremes. We must all admit that there are certain people who should not be allowed to have liquor.

That is one extreme. They should be treated as other sick are treated. The appalling abuses of liquor and beer interests is the other extreme. I attempt no defense of either.

We have legislated to protect the one class and to put the other out of business, forgetting the fact that between these two is a great mass of people, honest, industrious, self-respecting, self-governing, intelligent, and moral, who have a right to noninterference with their private business and their private lives so long as they do not invade the rights of others.

I have been reading in the public press of a great demonstration of protest against the present dry law to be held in the city of New York on July 4. It illustrates the point I am trying to make. A 2-inch advertisement by a newspaper artist calling for 100,000 men to parade for the restoration of personal liberty was answered by hundreds of thousands of New Yorkers, and enlistments are pouring in at the rate of from 25,000 to 100,000 a day. People from outside the city and even from other States want to take part, but have been refused because they would make the number too large to handle. The call was for men, but the women refused to be left out, and thousands from every walk of life and every station of society have pledged themselves to march. It is estimated that more than half a million men and women will participate, the largest parade New York has ever seen, more in numbers by far than took part in the preparedness parade, the peace parade, or the Pershing victory parade.

Similar demonstrations will be held in other places, and I have no doubt that a proportionately large number can be gathered for the same purpose in any place in this country.

These are the people that are beginning to be heard and will be heard from this time on until at least a measure of their personal liberty is restored. They represent no interests but their own. They are saying, "A plague on both your houses. We are acting for ourselves." They will get what they want. [Applause.]

I object also to the provision of section 2, which limits the number of prescriptions that a doctor may issue. If vinous and spirituous liquor is good medicine, why limit it to the first 100 persons who may need it in any period of 90 days? If such liquor is to be prescribed at all, why say that anyone who gets sick while the doctor still has some of his 100 left may have his medicine, but one who becomes equally or more seriously ill after the 100 is exhausted may be left to die while the doctor is trying to induce the commissioner to issue another life-saver or two?

The limitation is wholly inconsistent with the idea of medicine, and I believe it to be absolutely indefensible.

If we can not trust the doctors fully, we should not trust them at all.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I have no hope that anything that could be said here to-day will change a vote on this question. You are going to pass this bill. You have the votes and you think you are right. I sincerely hope you may be. But feeling as I do that we have already gone too far and that we should turn back at least part way instead of going further along the road we are traveling, I can not support this measure.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLASSON. No; I can not yield now. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish I had a little more time than I have to discuss this proposition. This is the first time in this Congress I have attempted to take the floor and I am not ashamed to take it on the question which confronts us this afternoon. [Applause.] On the contrary, I am proud to stand here in opposition to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the Judiciary Committee and this House reminds me of a story I heard about Uncle Joe when I first came to Congress. The House had got all "het up" over some reform and most of the Members had made flamboyant speeches in favor of the bill, when Uncle Joe, anxious to go on with the business of the House, rose and facetiously remarked, "Now, gentlemen, let us proceed to fool the country some more."

That was a very apt phrase, and whether made in jest or earnest at the time, it fits the situation this afternoon. We fooled the country with the Volstead law about a year ago, and now we are going to fool it some more with the Volstead law junior. The bill is not presented as an amendment to the Volstead Act, but is called "Supplemental to the national prohibition act," and I suggest that it be christened the "Volstead Act junior," that it may not have to bear the sins of the parent nor be hampered in its own hypocritical course as it goes out to fool the country some more. [Laughter and applause.]

The committee report on the first Volstead junior bill says that 100 prominent physicians petitioned for such legislation as this and denied the medical value of beer. Well, there are 150,000 licensed physicians in this country, and 100 appears to me a rather small minority; but that is in keeping with prohibition legislation. The advocates of this bill have severely criticized the American Therapeutical Society, which 10 days ago protested against this legislation, and it was confidently predicted that the American Medical Association would reaffirm its condemnation of alcohol as medicine. Well, the annual meeting of the American Medical Association was held in Boston within the past two weeks; on a test vote it refused to reaffirm its condemnation of alcohol as medicinal. So we appear to have the committee again bowing to the minority. But this is in keeping with the whole agitation and the legislation concerning prohibition. It has been legislation for the minority and regulation of the American people.

You know we are told by the historians that Egypt had physicians 3,000 years ago and they also were regulated by prohibition laws that compelled them to prescribe according to the statute. If they adopted any treatment of their own, they were put to death. We have one conspicuous historical relic of the medical skill of Egypt, the mummy. The physicians of that time preserved the bodies of their patients after death better than they did in life. And Egypt also died from too much regulation by law. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Minnesota may have this historical record in mind and is preparing the way for having his mummified body placed beside that of Rameses I, 3,000 years hence, when this land of the free has become like that of Egypt, a place for only one industry, of excavation to uncover the evidence of reform legislation. One never can tell the ultimate aim of the reformer, and I can see how a far-seeing man like Mr. VOLSTEAD might consider it the most lasting honor he can attain by having his mummified body laid beside that of Rameses I in the final day of judgment to represent the two conspicuous examples of medical practice by law. [Laughter and applause.]

I do not want to only find fault with the Committee on the Judiciary; I am glad I can say one good word for that great body of lawyers. I happen to be a newspaper man. They are true to the Union. The great majority of you here are lawyers and you can appreciate the efforts of the committee to encourage the profession. This bill will no doubt do that, as did the original Volstead Act. The Attorney General reports that the Volstead Act practically doubled the business of the Federal courts, that there are more than 80,000 cases pending before these courts, that there will have to be more judges, more district attorneys, and the creation of criminal courts of the United States to handle the criminal cases that have been brought into the Federal courts by the Volstead Act. This bill when enacted will add to the congestion of the Federal courts, compel Congress to create more judicial districts for more judges and district attorneys, make more business for the lawyers who have not secured election or appointment to office, and be a boon to the lawyers. I think I ought to concede this service to the profession by the Committee on the Judiciary and the lawyers of the House who will vote for the bill, "It is an ill wind that blows no good." This legislation is a windfall to the legal profession. It will hit the doctors, but we make law for the lawyers, not other professions.

Mr. VOLSTEAD is a lawyer, and I believe all the other members of the Judiciary Committee are lawyers, but what are we to think of their respect for their own work in the national prohibition act of a year ago when in their report they say:

> The chief purpose of this bill is to supplement the national prohibition act with provision so as to make certain that its construction will be the same as that which the administration has acted upon until the opinion of Attorney General Palmer was issued on March 3, 1921, in regard to the use of beer and wine as medicine.

The act has been administered by a man who did not pretend to be a lawyer, and who reversed and revised his rulings and interpretations almost every day, but when the Secretary of the Treasury requested an opinion from the Attorney General, who is the chief legal officer of the executive part of the Government, and that opinion is given, which the report recognizes as binding on the administration, the great and distinguished Committee on the Judiciary proposes to amend the act to keep it in harmony with the curbstone opinions of a man who never pretended to be a lawyer. Well, all I have got to say is that the committee has a lot of revision of the law to make before they catch up with Ex-Commissioner Kramer, whose interpretations of the law have been as variable as the tin rooster on the barn on a gusty March day.

He revised and rerevised his opinions to suit his humor or the necessities of his prohibition friends until no one, not even Mr. VOLSTEAD, can tell us this minute what this bill means. If that report is true and it is to make certain the construction of the national prohibition act as it was before the opinion of Attorney General Palmer was issued, why not provide in this law that the prohibition commissioner shall enforce prohibition throughout the country without any other law than his own sweet will? Make him by act of Congress the Pooh-Bah to hold his hand behind him for the inspiration of leniency.

That is what you propose to do indirectly by this bill, and we simply had better clothe the prohibition commissioner with the power to do just as he damned pleases, regardless of the law or the Constitution.

I wish I had the time to dissect the report written by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], wherein he himself has shown that the number of withdrawals of gallons of whisky since his act has been on the statute books was three times as great as they were in 12 months preceding the passage of the first Volstead Act. Further than that, I am amazed in that I find in the chairman of the Judiciary Committee the chief violator of the law in the whole country. He tells in that report, and he told the doctors from New York, how to make real beer—actual beer. His own law forbids that and makes it a crime to give any helpful information to those who intend to use their liquor for beverage purposes. And yet the gentleman from Minnesota himself told the doctors from New York just how to make real beer, and I am afraid——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. And I am afraid some of them will be acting in the near future after you have passed this bill.

I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not know how the gentleman got the information. I certainly never heard of it.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I read it in the printed report of the hearings on Mr. VOLSTEAD's first antibeer bill.

Mr. VOIGT. Will the gentleman please tell the public where that can be found? [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. The gentleman is sitting close to the originator of the thought, and I suggest he get a little closer. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, on the 29th day of January, 1919, the Secretary of State made official announcement that 36 States of the Union had adopted the eighteenth amendment to the National Constitution, which said amendment provided that—> the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

> The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

On the 28th day of October, 1919, Congress, over the veto of President Wilson, passed an enforcement measure to carry out the amendment to the Constitution, which was—

> An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

It was not expected that this enforcement act was perfect and that it would never need amendment to make it a more effective instrument to enforce this amendment to the Constitution. On the other hand, it was understood that the present enforcement law was an experiment, and if in practice the enemies of the law discovered defects or loopholes through which criminals could escape and the will of the people be defeated that the Congress would at once propose and make amendments to the law that would correct these errors, prevent the escape of the guilty, and maintain the majesty of the law.

The bill before us attempts to correct certain defects in the present enforcement law that have been discovered by the experience of those who have had the responsibility of its enforcement.

A few weeks ago the former Attorney General, A. Mitchell Palmer, ruled that under existing laws beer could legally be manufactured, sold, and prescribed, without limit, for medical purposes. This ruling was immediately followed by over 100 former brewers in the United States filing applications for permits to manufacture beer for medical purposes.

These brewers took advantage of the open door and now await with almost fiendish glee to see the brewery and saloon again restored and national prohibition defeated. The crisis is upon us. Congress must act promptly. There is no excuse for delay. The lawless classes must not profit from this ruling. The country is in earnest and the people demand the necessary legislation to protect the Nation.

During the last 18 months, in which this law has been in force, the enemies of the law and the outlaws who have attempted to still keep alive the unlawful traffic in intoxicating liquor have by every device known to the corrupt human mind discovered certain loopholes that will enable them to still maintain the illegal traffic in violation of the Constitution. Our committee in the consideration of this bill had before us Hon. John F. Kramer, prohibition commissioner, and I quote herewith a portion of his testimony before the committee:

STATEMENT OF MR. JOHN F. KRAMER, PROHIBITION COMMISSIONER, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kramer, will you tell us something about your views on this bill?

Mr. KRAMER. There is one beauty about this bill, as I view it, and that is it goes to the source of things. From my experience during the past year the successful administration of the law depends upon the question as to how close we can get hold of things at the source. It is no use in talking about opening the door and letting the horse be stolen and then getting after the thief. You have got to close the door before the horse is stolen, as much as possible, and that is what this bill, as I view it after reading it over, aims to do; it gets at the source of things.

I might say further that if it were not for the fact that the Attorney General rendered an opinion recently—some months back—in which he laid down certain fundamental principles you would hardly need this bill, because it embodies the things that we were trying to carry out during the past year, at any rate.

Take your provision you have in the bill to limit the number of prescriptions which a doctor may write in any period of time, that we have enforced during all the year, practically during the 18 months. We found that we absolutely had to do it. Before we adopted any regulation in reference to this matter the doctors were prescribing to the limit. Now, I do not mean the great majority of them were, but a few of them were.

The CHAIRMAN. There were enough of them?

Mr. KRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. There were wet spots?

Mr. KRAMER. Yes; and you realize this, gentlemen, that it takes only four or five physicians in any city or in any community absolutely to break down the whole law. If we do not have any control over it, you might just as well quit if you are going to permit them to prescribe without any limitation. The best doctors in the land urged upon us to place a limitation upon the number of prescriptions that could be issued.

We adopted a Treasury decision like this: That no doctor shall obtain a book of more than 100 prescriptions—prescription blanks—in a period of three months unless he could come in and show that the nature of his practice was such that he really ought to have more. And it has worked well. We have had no trouble. There have not been a dozen doctors that have complained, and those doctors who have complained need watching; that is all there is to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it not be a good idea to reduce that to 50?

Mr. KRAMER. Well, maybe. Perhaps we started out somewhat liberally. We did not know; but the best doctors—I remember one came into the office the other day. He had gotten a book months ago. He had used but 13 blanks. He said, "I do not want any more." He said, "I have all that I need." But there are a few doctors—we got one in Chicago the other day who wrote 400 emergency prescriptions in the space of a few days, and all his other prescriptions amounted to 15 for all other purposes. Of course, the commissioner is not any too wise—none of the men connected with our work are any too wise—but it did not take a very wise man to see that he was prostituting his profession to private gain.

I consider Hon. John F. Kramer, former Federal Prohibition Commissioner, an honest, faithful, public servant, and during his 18 months of service I have no doubt he brought to his duties an honest mind and made a faithful attempt to enforce the law. He was handicapped somewhat by some inefficient, even dishonest, agents. He was everywhere met by a determined opposition on the part of those who wish to bring the law into disrespect. He had to contend also with those who by every device undertook to circumvent the law and bring about its repeal and to obstruct its enforcement in every way that sharp lawyers could devise. In the American Legion Weekly, under date of April 1, 1921, Mr. Kramer reviews at length his experience during this 18 months, considers the problems we now have to meet, points out the successes he has achieved, and also the defects in the law that should be cured by legislation to make enforcement successful and efficient. I ask unanimous consent to make this article a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

Let us consider some of the problems which we have to solve in carrying out the provisions which have been incorporated into the national prohibition act.

First. We have the border problem. This problem is not at all new. Every village that voted dry under local option laws was always bothered more or less in carrying out the provisions of the law by the wet villages which were near it. Every State that adopted the principle of prohibition was more or less hindered in carrying out the principle by the wet States lying near it. And now the Nation, having adopted the principle of prohibition, is to some extent hindered in carrying out the principle by the nations which border upon us.

Second. The illicit distilling of whisky is a problem which requires considerable attention. This practice has been in vogue in the South for many years, but there is one factor which makes it somewhat more difficult to handle at this time, and that is the high price which the illicit distiller can secure for his whisky. Prior to prohibition days all the illicit distiller saved was the tax, but now he makes the entire price at which he can sell the whisky.

Third. The national prohibition act provides for the manufacture of patent, patented and proprietary medicines, hair tonics, extracts, and the like, and makes provision for the use of intoxicating liquor in the preparation of these articles. This offers a problem in that unscrupulous manufacturers will at times divert the liquor which they secure for manufacturing purposes, or place their product upon the market to be used for beverage purposes rather than for medicinal purposes.

Fourth. The large quantities of liquor which were in bond at the time the national prohibition act became effective have been a problem of no mean proportions. We have had difficulty in that the liquor has been stolen at times from the warehouses or withdrawn upon forged permits, and this latter difficulty is the more serious of the two.

Fifth. Under the law manufacturers have the right to make cereal beverages and place them on the market for sale, providing they contain under one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume. In making a cereal beverage manufacturers are permitted to produce a preparation with 3 or 4 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, after which it must be dealcoholized; that is, the alcohol must be taken from the beverage so that the latter is reduced to a strength not to exceed one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume. This provision of the law has given rise to some difficulties in that some of the breweries of the country place the product upon the market before it is dealcoholized.

Sixth. The matter of home brewing and distilling is a problem which requires some thought and attention on the part of the authorities.

Seventh. Not the least of our difficulties has to do with the organization which has to be formed to carry out the provisions of the national prohibition act. These agents are at times severely tried and tempted, and some of them fall. It is altogether likely that some joined the organization because of the opportunities which it affords for unlawful gain.

I might mention other problems, but the ones herein mentioned are the main ones. It might be considered, at first thought, that these problems are so difficult as to make it impossible to solve them. This, however, is not at all true. Let us note them a little more carefully.

Take the border problem, for instance. This really amounts to but little when considered from the viewpoint of the country as a whole. The liquor which comes over the border is confined mainly to the rim of the country, though of course some of it finds its way into the interior. It is a somewhat aggravating problem, however, and will be such until the countries bordering upon our own adopt a different policy from that which they now have in connection with the liquor traffic. It can, of course, be more and more checked as our organization becomes perfected from time to time.

The illicit distilling in the South is a problem which will be before us for some time to come. It will be checked gradually, however, as the sentiment of the people in the different communities becomes strong against it, and as the Federal, State, and local officials come more closely in touch with the situation and perform their full duties in connection therewith.

The problem which arises from the manufacture of patent and proprietary medicines can be practically solved by driving out of business the illegitimate manufacturer of medicines, by taking some of the preparations off the market entirely and by requiring others to be more highly medicated than they now are, so as to render them unfit for use for beverage purposes. Further, this difficulty can be overcome to some extent by compelling the alcohol in many instances to be denatured on the distillery premises prior to its shipment by the distiller.

The problem connected with the large quantities of whisky in bonded warehouses is gradually being solved. We have permitted no withdrawals for some time in the past, and none will be permitted for some time to come. We hape adopted a system of withdrawals which we hope will practically solve the matter of withdrawing liquors upon forged permits. Further, there will from now on be no wholesale liquor dealers, as such, and thus the number who can withdraw whiskies at all will be greatly reduced.

The problem arising from the manufacture of cereal beverages is also gradually being solved. We have now a squad of skilled brewery men who are securing evidence against many of the breweries that are violating the law. Undoubtedly, permits issued to some of these companies will have to be revoked before they will see their way clear to obey the law. This is a most drastic remedy, as it practically destroys the value of the property in that no beverage could be manufactured for a year after the permit is revoked. But, notwithstanding that it is drastic, it undoubtedly will have to be used, and such a course is clearly provided for in the law.

The question of home brewing and distilling is aggravating and will undoubtedly require attention from time to time; but to my way of thinking, this is mainly a fad, an adventure, an experiment. Older persons are much like boys and girls, and they like to do for a time those things which they are told not to do. Many persons already who entered upon these experiments for a time have become disgusted with the business and have quit. I believe this problem will mainly solve itself, although undoubtedly, as suggested, the law will have to take note of it at times.

The social aspect of drink is entirely gone. But few recruits are being enlisted in the great army of drinkers, and this for the reason that there is nothing connected with the service which appeals to the youth of the land. Moreover, thousands and thousands of those who always have been in the ranks are deserting the army because it now has no standing or leadership in this country. Men are learning rapidly that the great bulk of the liquor which is now to be found is nothing more than poisonous concoctions of one kind or another.

The great mass of men will not long be induced to follow such a mirage or deception. Let the law stand as it is for a year or two longer, and the sentiment of the people against the liquor traffic will have so crystallized that few will even advocate the return of light wines and beer. In the beginning the work is difficult, because there are many appetites and habits demanding satisfaction. The work is becoming easier and easier, and will so continue. In a comparatively short time the attitude of the people toward liquor will have so changed that it will be an easy matter to carry out the provisions of the law.

And let me suggest that even though it does require some years to clean up the refuse and débris which resulted from the traffic in intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, it would be the greatest work ever accomplished in so short a space of time.

Mr. HERSEY. You will note from the printed hearings before our committee that medicinal beer has no friends. No reputable physician appeared before our committee in favor of beer as a medicine. Even the representatives of former brewers were opposed, on the ground that the Government should not manufacture and sell beer as a medicine unless they permitted its unrestricted manufacture and sale, because beer is not a medicine but a beverage.

On pages 40 and 41 of the hearings appear the statement of Mr. Oliver T. Remners, attorney for one of the largest former beer manufacturers in the United States. Among other things, he said:

STATEMENT OF MR. OLIVER T. REMNERS, ATTORNEY FOR ANHEUSER-BUSCH (INC.), ST. LOUIS, MO.

Mr. MICHENER. Are you, or are you not, in favor of the open saloon?

Mr. REMNERS. We are opposed to prohibition. It is a question of distribution; it is a question of which is the best method of distribution.

As attorney for Anheuser-Busch (Inc.), of St. Louis, formerly the largest manufacturer of beer in the world, without relinquishing the principles we have always maintained, I am authorized to speak in favor of the enactment of this amendment forbidding the manufacture and sale of beer for medicinal purposes for the following vital and fundamental reasons:

First. The firm I represent has always stood four square for law enforcement, however much it may have been opposed to the principles of sumptuary laws or such laws in themselves.

Second. Authorization of the sale of beer for medicinal purposes, under the provisions of the present enforcement act, will make it absolutely impossible to enforce the prohibition laws. While we are unalterably opposed to the principle of prohibition, we insist that since the principle of prohibition has been written into the Constitution and the statutes the law should be enforced to the letter, fearlessly, fairly, and with impartiality. It will be only by the enforcement of the prohibition law so stringently that everybody, rich and poor alike, will be denied the use of alcoholic liquors that the American people, after a full and fair trial, will determine in their sober, solemn, second judgment whether they want to continue its operation or whether they want to amend or repeal it. It is our position that every law should be submitted to such a fair and impartial test, regardless of how that law affects our business interests.

You, as members of this committee, know, and I know, that the interpretation of the law permitting the sale of beer for medicinal purposes, in its practical operation, will result principally in the sale of beer at outrageous prices, through restricted channels, to the healthy and not the sick.

The verse we facetiously sang in local-option elections about the saloon, "Don't you cry, you'll be a drug store bye and bye," will become a reality. You know that every doctor will be besieged by his regular patients for beer prescriptions, that the standard and dignity of the medical profession will be lowered, and that the doctor himself will practically become the bartender for his perfectly healthy customers. He can not well refuse to issue such prescriptions, as his practice must inevitably suffer, because a great many of his patients would take offense at his attitude and find other more accommodating family physicians.

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, the well-known medical writer and pure-food expert, testified before our committee as follows (p. 296):

So far as I know I have never seen in any medical work on materia medica or on therapeutics any reference to beer as a remedial agent. I have a number of such works in my library, and this morning I took the trouble to look through the indices of all of them and I did not find the title "beer" in any of the indices of those works. I conclude therefrom that beer has never been recognized by the medical profession as a remedial agent.

So far as I know I have never seen a prescription written by a physician which included beer as one of its elements. There may have been such prescriptions, but I have not had my attention drawn to them.

But beer has been regarded solely and simply as a beverage.

Dr. Wiley in a late magazine article further said:

A large majority of ethical physicians in this country are fully convinced of the fact that alcohol has no medicinal or tonic value, no matter in what form it may be administered. They believe that the sole use of alcohol in medicine is as a solvent for medicinal principles which otherwise would be difficult of employment. Take alcohol out of the tinctures and its function in medicine is destroyed.

We had also before us Dr. Howard A. Kelly, of Johns Hopkins University, who testified, in part, as follows (p. 97):

STATEMENT OF DR. HOWARD A. KELLY, EMERITUS PROFESSOR, JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY, BALTIMORE, MD.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that we are to hear from Dr. Kelly.

Dr. KELLY. To legitimize myself as a witness, let me state that I am Dr. Howard A. Kelly, emeritus professor, Johns Hopkins University, and for 30 years one of the surgeons attending the Johns Hopkins Hospital. I studied medicine in 1877–1882 at the University of Pennsylvania and was graduated in the latter year. Shall I now speak to the purpose of the gathering?

The CHAIRMAN. You may.

Dr. KELLY. I can state succinctly and briefly, sir, that in all my years of practice from 1882 on I have never known any occasion to prescribe beer. I have held countless consultations with some of the most distinguished men in the country as well as average practitioners, and I have never had any occasion or known them to suggest that beer was a remedy of any sort for any kind of a disease whatever. If it should be contended that alcohol is sometimes of use, I have the remedy at my disposal at the drug store—alcohol. If some one will contend that malt is useful, it is very easy to prescribe malt or in a prescription to combine the two and so secure their utility. That does not involve the rehabilitation of the brewing interests of the country and is easily managed from any reputable drug store.

When I was a young man, in my earlier days, particularly in Philadelphia, where I was associated with men like Weir Mitchell, William Pepper, and D. Hayes Agnew, who attended President Garfield, it was often the custom to give liquor—considered a sheet anchor—in typhoid fever, for example, and in sundry other diseases. Medicine is an experimental science. We do not know that strychnine kills until we give it to the patient. We make and use remedies that have to be tried out for a considerable time to determine their utility. Pepsin used to be prescribed by the ton in this country; it is now prescribed by none. Ergot used to be prescribed universally for fibroid tumors in women; absolutely never given now; I mean in the special treatment of diseases of women.

Experience has shown that these alcoholics did practically no good unless they do in a rare, occasional case, which we can readily reach by prescribing alcohol from the drug store, if we think it necessary. The question is not alcohol, but beer, I understand. I know of no use for beer.

Our committee was flooded with petitions, statements, and letters from the most reputable physicians all over the Union objecting to the use of beer or other malt liquors as medical remedies. The following is a sample:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, May 10, 1921.

Hon. A. J. VOLSTEAD, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

The Ohio State Medical Association, representing 4,500 regular physicians, indorses overwhelmingly the prohibition of the liquor traffic for beverage purposes and can see no excuse for the use of beer or other malt liquors as medical remedies. Personally, as a teacher in a medical school, I have taught for years that any supposed indications for their use could be satisfactorily met in other ways.

J. H. J. UPHAM,
Chairman Committee on Public Policy and Legislation,
Professor of Medicine, Ohio State University.

I am pleased that I am a Representative in Congress from a State that has 1,179 registered physicians, and not one of them during the last 18 months has applied for a permit to prescribe intoxicating liquors. I have received a great many letters from physicians all over my State and have only opportunity to quote from many one letter from a very reputable physician, as follows:

LIVERMORE FALLS, ME., May 11, 1921.

Hon. IRA G. HERSEY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Under present conditions does an entire stranger dare too much in expressing to you the merely personal opinion of a physician concerning the "new Volstead bill," so called, and with which, if I am informed correctly, you are to come somewhat intimately in contact?

What I would like to say is, that in nearly 40 years' experience with sick people I have yet to learn that their welfare and recovery are at all dependent upon the administration of beer, or alcoholics of any kind.

In view of present-day methods this whole question, as pertaining to the treatment of the sick, is an absurdity—its continual agitation a mere device of the thirsty who are striving to utilize physicians and druggists in an attempt to nullify the law's intent. Pardon me if I subscribe myself cordially, a "wicked Democrat," and

Very sincerely, yours,

CHARLES H. OAKES, M. D.

When we turn to the Nation we find that only 22 per cent of the physicians of the United States prescribe liquors of any kind; that of the 152,627 physicians of the United States 78 per cent have taken out no permits whatever and in 24 States no physicians have permits to prescribe liquor for medicinal purposes.

I note in the making of appropriations to enforce the eighteenth amendment there has been much criticism about the amount of money raised by the Government to enforce the law, and the impression has gone out to the people that the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment has brought much cost and expense to the taxpayers. Mr. Kramer, the commissioner, has cleared the atmosphere by testifying before our committee as follows:

Mr. SUMNERS. What has been the amount of fines and penalties collected by the Government in the last year?

Mr. KRAMER. Vast sums.

Mr. SUMNERS. That is the thought that was in my mind. Have your fines and penalties been sufficient in amount to equalize the cost of administration?

Mr. KRAMER. Yes.

While this is not a question of the wisdom or unwisdom of the law and not a question of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, yet it is interesting to note from the best figures available that the eighteenth amendment has saved to this Nation $100,000,000 per year.

Our duty is plain to give to the new enforcement commissioner and his agents the best enforcement law that experience can devise.

President Harding, in his speech of acceptance, set forth the general principles upon which every Congressman in the honest discharge of his duty should act to-day. He said:

I believe in law enforcement. If elected, I mean to be a constitutional President, and it is impossible to ignore the Constitution, unthinkable to evade the law, when our every committal is to orderly government. People ever will differ about the wisdom of the enactment of a law—there is divided opinion respecting the eighteenth amendment and the laws enacted to make it operative—but there can be no difference of opinion about honest law enforcement.

Neither Government nor party can afford to cheat the American people. The laws of Congress must harmonize with the Constitution, else they soon are adjudged to be void; Congress enacts the laws and the executive branch of government is charged with enforcement. We can not nullify because of divided opinion; we can not jeopardize orderly government with contempt for law enforcement. Modification or repeal is the right of a free people whenever the deliberate and intelligent public sentiment commands, but perversion and evasion mark the paths to the failure of government itself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The time is as follows:

The gentleman from Minnesota has consumed 20 minutes, the gentleman from Wisconsin has consumed 20 minutes, the gentleman from Illinois has consumed 10 minutes, and the gentleman from Texas has consumed 5 minutes.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is recognized.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, it must be conceded that the eighteenth amendment imposed regulations on the social life of the people more drastic than any previous legislation. But there are all-compelling reasons why this amendment was adopted, and there are equally strong reasons for its rigid enforcement. The amendment was adopted by an unprecedented proportion of the States—45 out of 48—and when in October, 1919, the Volstead Act was pending here it passed over the veto of the President by an unprecedented majority. If there has been a solemn expression of the will of the people, beyond any influence of haste or hysteria, for the settlement of any question, it was on this subject of prohibition. A change would introduce an element of instability in the management of public affairs which would threaten the permanence of any action taken. Our legislation or policy would become as the shifting sands if we did not carry out the mandate of the people.

There were very potent reasons for the adoption of this amendment and its passage by so great a majority. First, I will mention the change of opinion of the medical profession. I have in my hand a book obtained from the Library, published in 1853, which was the first declaration by any physiologist of international reputation in favor of total abstinence. It is a prize essay on the use and abuse of alcohol, written by Dr. William B. Carpenter, author of a monumental work on physiology. A great majority of the profession now condemn the use of alcohol. The second reason is one of efficiency. Insanity, crime, and demoralization resulted from the drink habit, and people had become so roused upon this subject that severe legislation was adopted in the States and in the Nation. This explains the war prohibition act. Another reason is that the people of the United States do not believe in a bloc that takes a place apart from the principles that divide the rest of the people and unites on behalf of a particular interest. This was notable in the case of those engaged in the liquor business. The question has often been asked why the State of Ohio gave Mr. Wilson so large a majority in 1916. For some reason, I hardly know why, the word was sent around a few days before that election in November, that everyone interested in the liquor business should vote for him. That explains very largely the enormous vote that he obtained. In addition to these influences which I have mentioned great moral influences have been at work—churches and philanthropists—those who look forward and upward. They have hoped that by this legislation the quality of our population may be improved, that the drunkard may be reformed, that the dull eye may become bright, that the staggering gait may become a manly tread, and that the resources of the wage earner, often wasted in dissipation and drink, may be used for the comfort of his family, to bring light and hope into the home for his wife and children. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the general history of this matter has been gone over fully. The arguments made here to-day are the same as those which were made when the prohibition amendment was before the House. The same argument is now made as was made when the enforcement act was before the House, and the same arguments are now made that were made before the Supreme Court of the United States; at least, they are made by a few to-day.

There is not any question but that the efficiency of mankind in the United States has been raised very materially, in many of the industries 25 to 40 per cent. Home conditions have been advanced. Children have been sent to school and clothed that never were before. Homes are in better condition since the liquor has been taken from them than at any time before.

I have received two arguments and many general pamphlets; but there have been two arguments presented, and I suppose every Member of the House has received them—those in favor and those against. The one that I want to insert in my remarks is a postal card from "an ex-drunkard who began on beer." I will not take the time to read it, but will insert it.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. No; I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RAKER. The postal card reads as follows:

Two couples were standing in the spirit world viewing the actions of their children in this world. My wife and I saw our boy staggering through the streets. Our agony was intensified by an angel, who said, "Had you done your duty this would not have been." I had lived a drunken life until almost ready for the grave, and she was in favor of and kept "beer and light wines" for daily temperate consumption.

My companion and wife, a man and woman who had never drunk anything intoxicating, but who had upheld the rights of others to do so—the man a Member of Congress, his wife a social leader—gazed on the little daughter whom they had left below in a drunkard's home surrounded by poverty and misery.

As before, the angel said, "Had you done your duty when an inhabitant of the world this would not have been." "But I never did any of these things." "True, but your influence was never exerted against them, and you are as guilty, if not more so, than your friend."

Moral: Fight beer "and light wines" and all officials who favor them as you would a rattlesnake, for, as has been well said, "It is a notorious fact that nearly all drunkards begin by drinking 'light wines and beer' when young, and as the appetite grows the desire for stronger drink is developed."

AN EX-DRUNKARD WHO BEGAN ON BEER.

The other arguments are those that are opposed to this legislation. One of them I could not submit to the committee to have it printed. The only way I can do so is to present it publicly to the House as the argument of those who are opposed to this kind of legislation, and the argument consists in a postal card about 4 inches long and 2 inches or 2½ inches wide, with a 2-cent stamp, addressed as follows: "Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C." Attached to that is a piece of tobacco an inch square by a quarter of an inch thick; and, as an argument against this legislation and to bring humiliation to the man who had the courage as a member of the committee to do his duty and report a bill, it is asked that the following disposition be made of this little chew of tobacco, which reads as follows:

Unfit for chewing purposes. Contains 1 grain of tartar emetic. Please hand to Mr. VOLSTEAD.

That is the argument that is made against this legislation. It shows they have exhausted all proper means or methods of argument. The law has been enforced, and they take the method now of using the mails for this kind of an argument to be submitted to the American Congress in voting on an important bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman be allowed half a minute more. I want to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. I want to ask the gentleman if he knows who sent those cards out?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The control of the time is in the hands of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have half a minute more to answer.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Can the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] yield time?

Mr. HILL. I asked if the gentleman knew who sent it out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland has no time in his control on this bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is recognized.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Speaker, the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead law for its enforcement were enacted during the period when our country was at war, and must, therefore, be regarded strictly as a war measure which would be promptly repealed, as all other strictly war measures have been repealed and are to be repealed.

The eighteenth amendment prohibits the manufacture, sale, transportation, import, and export of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

There is no provision in this constitutional amendment against the use of such intoxicating liquors for medicinal, sacramental, and certain manufacturing purposes, but, on the contrary, the amendment expressly provides for their use for medicinal and sacramental purposes.

Under the ruling of former Attorney General Palmer, the existing law contained no prohibition against the use, for medicinal purposes in reasonable quantities, of spirituous liquors—that is, whisky and brandy—proof spirits—and wine and beer or other malt liquors of sufficient alcoholic content to be intoxicating—if in the good and honest judgment of the attending physician, they should be used in the treatment of disease.

As the whole spirit of the eighteenth amendment—prohibition—is to lessen the consumption of intoxicating beverages by the people of the United States, particularly beverages of the higher alcoholic content, the inconsistency, absurdity, and injustice of the provisions of these proposed amendments as provided for by H. R. 7294, known as the Campbell bill, to the existing Volstead law, will appear to all who desire to be fair and unprejudiced. It is obvious that if physicians can legally prescribe and furnish as they may do under this resolution, to any one person, in any period of 10 days, as much as one-fourth gallon of vinous liquor—wine—of 24 per cent alcohol content, by volume, and also can furnish or prescribe for any one person within the same period of time any liquor that contains as much as one-half pint of alcohol, that there would be no violation of the spirit of the prohibition amendment, and of the reasonable intent of the American people who "put over" this amendment, if the bill now under consideration would permit licensed physicians, in the interest of treating and curing their patients, to prescribe beer and malt liquor, which, with the strongest alcoholic content, would not contain in the case of beer more than from 3 to 6 per cent of alcohol, and in the case of ale, porter, or stout a slightly greater alcoholic content than good beer.

This brings us logically to the consideration of what is good beer and what is not beer at all. The manufacture of ale or beer is of very great antiquity. Heroditus ascribes the invention of brewing to Isis, and tells us that the Egyptians drank a liquor which they called zuthos, fermented from barley. Ale or beer was never used to a great extent in Greece or Italy, partly owing to the abundance of wine in these countries. Xenophon, in his "Anabasis," mentions it as being used among the inhabitants of Armenia, and the Gauls were also acquainted with it in early times. Ale or beer was in common use in Germany in the time of Tacitus. It can not be too strongly stated that the stuff now called beer and legally sold throughout the United States, containing, under the Volstead law, not more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, is worse than no beer; it is literally "rotten," for the reason that it does not contain—and can not legally under the Volstead law contain—sufficient alcohol to preserve the ingredients out of which it is made. This near beer and any other malt liquor that is now being legally made and sold may contain the very best materials out of which good beer and malt liquors should be manufactured, but it is chemically impossible to make any beer or other medically useful beer or malt liquor without sufficient alcoholic content to preserve the vegetable ingredients contained in the three classes of malted liquor—ale, beer, and porter, all containing, in varying proportions, hops, yeast, malt, barley, and so forth, and each class having its own mode of fermentation and treatment in its manufacture. The beneficial action of these malt liquors in a medicinal way is due not only to the nutritious tonic and stimulating effects of the properties referred to, but also to the fact that they contain in varying degrees, according to all the leading medical authorities on therapeutics and the practice of medicine, other valuable medicinal properties, such as potassium and sodium salts, lactic acid, carbonic acid gas, and so forth.

Just as without sufficient alcohol, the vegetable ingredients of medical tinctures and other preparations can not be prevented from deteriorating, so that vegetable and other ingredients of beer must be preserved and prevented from unwholesome fermentation and chemical deterioration by the presence of a sufficient percentage of alcohol; in other words, these medical vegetable tinctures and other preparations used in medicine must be preserved and prevented from unwholesome fermentation and chemical deterioration by sufficient alcoholic content used in their preparation. Most vegetable tinctures and preparations used in medicine contain and require from 18 to 40 per cent of alcohol to preserve them and prevent chemical deterioration.

If sufficient alcoholic content is necessary to prevent deterioration of tinctures and other preparations used in medicine, why, in the name of the public health, should not enough alcohol be allowed in the American people's beer, also, to make it healthful? What better, or more refreshing or more wholesome beverage do these scientific benefactors of the human race, who father this bill, offer to the millions of decent men and women of this country who have always had and enjoyed a glass of good beer and whose fathers and forefathers have had their beer, and prospered with it? If the masses of people are to be hounded by a system of repressive, un-American blue laws and treated and convicted as felons and common criminals if they insist on drinking a glass of decent beer, then how can any sane statesman see anything but an increasing unrest in the already menacing state of affairs throughout the country?

The proposition involved in this proposed amendment is, if strong alcohol and strong wine—as much as 24 per cent alcoholic content—are to be prescribed under the authority of this law, which it is proposed to enact to-day, what harm would be done to permit the physician under authority of the same law to prescribe standard beer of far less alcoholic strength—not to exceed 6 or 7 per cent in alcoholic strength? Unless the physician is given the legal right to prescribe beer or a properly prepared malt liquor he will be unjustly and arbitrarily deprived of a valuable therapeutic agent in the treatment of disease, notwithstanding the statements to the contrary in the hearings on this bill by certain holier-than-thou, high-browed, self-constituted medical specialists, from a notable medical school, who found the time and inclination to be heard by the Judiciary Committee, on the utterly untenable proposition that beer and malt liquors have no place in the practice of medicine. Certain of these physicians, who would lightly deprive all the other approximately 150,000 reputable physicians of this country of their traditional rights and stamp all physicians as cheap bootleggers, are known to be sensational advertisers who approach dangerously near being considered "quacks" by those physicians who are in position to know them and their methods. It is a matter of common knowledge that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], was at least reluctant to hear any testimony before his committee that favored beer in any manner and that he in some instances treated certain witnesses who testified before the committee with scant, if any, courtesy. I myself went personally to and requested the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, to allow me, as a physician and as a citizen and as a Member of this House, to go before the committee and testify as to the whole truth about beer and malt liquor in the practice of medicine. He replied that he would allow me to appear before the committee, but he would allow me only 10 minutes in which to present this important subject. It is a well-known fact that he gave witnesses opposing beer much more time. I declined to appear before the committee under the conditions imposed. I think I will show the absurdity and injustice of this attempt to discriminate against beer in medicine and the grave injustice of discriminating against and insulting the great medical profession of the United States, who as humanitarians, patriotic American citizens are the peer of any profession or class of good, law-abiding citizens. That these physicians are almost unanimous in resenting this injustice is shown by the fact that both schools of physicians, the regulars and the homeopaths, assembled as great national associations, have within three weeks passed resolution expressing their unqualified disapproval of this measure and their keen resentment of this proposed discrimination. I refer particularly to the resolutions to this effect passed by the National Association of Homeopathic Physicians and also by the American Therapeutic Association, composed of leading physicians all over the United States who have made a specialty of the study and administration of drugs and medicines and therefore speak on this subject with the highest authority.

All leading medical authorities in the United States and Europe indorse the use in all their textbooks and teachings for physicians and medical students from time immemorial of beer, stout, porter, and ale as types of malt liquors to be used in the successful treatment of various diseases.

Prof. Hobart Amory Hare, professor of therapeutics and materia medica at the Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, in his textbook of Practical Therapeutics, seventeenth edition, 1918, says on page 82:

> Stout and porter and well-brewed beer are of value in wasting diseases and in convalescence from acute diseases and for nursing women. Most of the beer in America contains about 4 to 6 per cent of alcohol.

George Butler, A. M., M. D., and so forth, professor of therapeutics and pharmacology, Chicago College of Medicine and Surgery, and so forth, in his textbook of Materia Medica, Pharmacology and Therapeutics, sixth edition, says:

> Alcohol in the form of beer or ale, taken before or during meals, is an efficient stomachic (meaning a good medicine and tonic for the stomach); a tonic for dyspepsia and weakened digestion attendant on or upon convalescence from acute diseases. Convalescents are often greatly benefited by some form of alcohol as it is contained in beer and ale. When the digestion becomes impaired as the result of physical or mental exhaustion the drug (alcohol in the form of beer and ale) serves a useful purpose as a tonic.

Prof. Oliver T. Osborne, department of medicine, Yale University, is also authority for the following statement:

> Strenuous exercise and hard labor will allow a man to take more alcohol without harm than can be used by a man of sedentary habits. There is no doubt alcohol can be used as a substitute for food in the place of sugar and starch. In emergencies it may thus sustain and give life.

This particularly applies to the use of malt liquors, beer, ale, stout, and porter, and it also proves that alcohol, particularly the small percentage contained in malt liquors, is a food as well as a reconstructive tonic, stimulant, and tissue builder in wasting and other diseases.

Prof. Otis Larch, medical department, Tulane University, at New Orleans, in his standard textbook on Medical Diagnosis, page 39, says:

> Malt beer is rich in carbohydrates and is frequently prescribed.

Sir Victor Horsley, M. D., and Dr. Sturge, the authors of the well-known book, "Alcohol and the Human Body," and who violently oppose the use of intoxicating beverages and whose book was written solely against the use of alcohol as a beverage, in discussing the effect of malt liquors on the human digestion, page 212, state:

These beverages (malt liquors) contain only from 4 to 6 per cent of alcohol (8 to 12 per cent of proof spirits), so that the alcohol contained in them could scarcely ever on its own account produce any bad effect.

Tea and coffee—

Horsley says—

were also proved to do harm.

Note that the claim is made by this most widely read and extensively quoted medical authority on the effects of alcohol on the human body that the effect of malt liquors, which include beer, porter, and stout, of the small alcoholic content of from 3 to 6 per cent—8 to 12 per cent proof spirit—could scarcely ever on its own account produce any bad effect, except through the effects of large quantities of such beverages, if taken with meals, causing dilution of the food in the process of digestion.

Everyone knows that too much water, coffee, tea, and so forth, taken with meals would retard digestion in the same way, and also that digestion is not only not interfered with but that it is aided by reasonable quantities of good malt liquor, beer, ale, porter, or stout.

The existing Volstead law permits regularly licensed physicians to legally prescribe for their patients whisky, brandy, wines, beer, and malt liquors of such alcoholic strength as to be intoxicating. But with the excuse of preventing the abuse of prescribing beer, by a very small percentage of physicians, the pending measure (H. R. 7294) proposes arbitrarily and without reason to prohibit physicians from prescribing beer and malt liquors of standard alcoholic strength of 3 to 6 per cent. This bill, notwithstanding this prohibition as regards the prescribing of such beer, permits physicians to legally prescribe for medical purposes spirituous and vinous liquors—vinous liquor—wines—that contain not more than 24 per cent of alcohol by volume, provided that not more than one-fourth of a gallon of such vinous liquor is prescribed or furnished for use for any one person within any period of 10 days, and so permits the prescribing or furnishing by the physician of any liquor that contains as much as one-half pint of alcohol—grain alcohol—for use of any one person within a period of 10 days.

Both the existing Volstead law and the amendments to it, now proposed, constitute a grave interference with the rights of both the physician and his patients, for whom he should at all times have the right to prescribe any drug or agent which, in his honest and good judgment, is really needed. Under the Harrison narcotic drug law and under all of the laws of the respective States intended to regulate the prescribing of dangerous narcotic and other drugs, the physician is permitted to prescribe most poisonous narcotic drugs, under proper regulations, but he can not under the pending measure prescribe any beer of the weak alcoholic strength of from 3 to 6 per cent. How inconsistent and absurd. It is also a matter of fact, from the medical point of view, that this proposed law will not meet the needs of the physician and his patients in respect to the alcoholic and vinous liquor which the physician may legally prescribe or furnish. I, as a physician practicing for over 30 years in the specialty of treating alcoholic and drug addicts, know of my own knowledge and experience that many alcoholic and other cases require for the most scientific treatment of their diseases, particularly in the so-called tapering treatment of alcoholism and delirium tremens cases, from 2 to 3 fluid ounces of proof whisky, diluted every three or four hours, one patient thus requiring more whisky in 24 hours than the physician is allowed to legally prescribe in any period of 10 days.

This amount would be actually necessary in many such cases to save a valuable life or to prevent an outright attack of insanity. The only way, legally, the physician could obtain a greater amount of spirituous liquor—that is, the equivalent to about 1 pint of proof whisky or brandy which he could prescribe in a 10-day period—would be for him to prove to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or to his widely scattered representatives that the circumstances in a given case would constitute an extraordinary reason. This would mean, according to the experience of many physicians who may have dozens of such cases under treatment, that either the physician would incur a risk of a prison term in a Federal prison if he took the law into his own hands in order to save the life of his patient, or if he obeyed this unjust law allow his patient to die because of the lack of proper medical treatment.

These restrictions are all the more unjust because they not only allow the prescribing of too small quantities of liquors, as just pointed out, but because they limit the physician to 100 prescriptions in 90 days, although a busy physician might have fully 100 or more patients during 90 days requiring alcohol.

After a study of this whole question from the viewpoint of the ultimate welfare of our country, I believe that the deplorable conditions as regards increasing drug addictions and bootleggers, and the increasing contempt for the laws that are causing these conditions, could be rapidly relieved if the Congress would pass reasonably liberal laws for the enforcement of the prohibition amendment; if, instead of fixing arbitrarily one-half of 1 per cent of alcoholic content for beer, an alcoholic content were fixed sufficient to make decent beer—to prevent the fermentation of the vegetable ingredients contained in the beer. This would satisfy the masses of people and bring about more real temperance and more respect for law and order. If respect for law and order is not restored in this country, it would be difficult to predict the consequences.

As a protest against these conditions and against the enactment of new blue laws of repression and oppression, the people of the district I have the honor to represent here, the Borough of Queens, New York, will parade a hundred thousand, made up of law-abiding citizens of all classes, to-morrow night. The citizens of the Greater City of New York will July 4 next have the largest parade in her history of magnificent parades of approximately 1,000,000 citizens as a solemn protest against the further encroachment of their personal liberty.

I hope my esteemed colleagues, particularly those of the majority party who control the committees which have reported this un-American, unreasonable, unjust, and repressive measure, will agree that I have made out the case, at least from the medical side, as to the usefulness of beer and malt liquor in the practice of medicine, and that is strictly the issue drawn in the most important section—section 2—of the pending bill.

Appended are the scientific opinions of Noble P. Barnes, M. D., chairman of the council of the American Therapeutic Society, Arlington Hotel, Washington, D. C., and C. E. de M. Sajous, M. D., of Philadelphia, and also resolutions of the American Therapeutic Society:

THE ARLINGTON,
Washington, D. C., Saturday, June 25, 1921.

Mr. J. J. KINDRED, M. D.,
House of Representatives of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KINDRED: The secretary of the American Therapeutic Society, Dr. Lewis Taylor, is not in the city, but will return to Washington Monday morning. I have left instructions for him to get into communication with you at once upon his return.

The mental note I have of the resolution of the American Therapeutic Society is as follows: "That physicians and surgeons should have the unimpaired right of prescribing this drug (alcohol) without any foolish restrictions."

The society does not approve of liquor-prescribing doctors, the society does not wish to interfere with or violate the eighteenth amendment, but the society does want to go on record as maintaining that no legislative body or enforcement authority should limit or hamper a doctor of medicine in the legitimate exercise of his functions as a physician.

Alcohol, per se, is a drug and should be classed as such. It has a definite physiological action, and a wide range of therapeutic application. It is not only useful but absolutely necessary in the treatment of certain conditions and in the manufacture of other drugs.

The restrictions, regulations, and taxation placed about and upon this drug to-day makes an enormous cost to the sick who are usually poor. The limit in quantity (e. g., a pint of whisky every two weeks) and other regulations that are effected by ignorant if well meaning clerks and Government officials are little short of insults to the honest, scientific members of the medical profession.

Alcoholic products constituting the so-called intoxicating liquors should likewise be classed as drugs. Just here I will add that the proper persons to determine the toxicity of drugs are recognized scientific physicians, chemists, and physiologists.

There are many conditions where light wines, beer, ale, stout, porter, etc., are needed and if the articles contain an intoxicating amount of alcohol they, too, should be classed as drugs and the physician should be given the privilege to practice his profession with as little red tape as possible. An active scientific physician with his mind occupied in important problems does not want to be annoyed by excessive clerical detail.

I am inclosing a published letter written by Dr. C. E. de M. Sajous. Dr. Sajous is a member of the council of the American Therapeutic Society and one of the recognized leaders in the American medical profession. His deductions are well worth serious consideration.

Thanking you for your courtesy to me and your interest in matters pertinent to the medical profession, I am, with every good wish,

Yours, fraternally,

N. P. BARNES, M. D.,
Chairman of the Council of the American Therapeutic Society.

[From the Public Ledger of Philadelphia, June 2, 1921.]

SCIENTISTS ARBITERS FOR USE OF ALCOHOL—DR. SAJOUS DECLARES THAT MEDICAL EXPERTS SHOULD DETERMINE WHAT ARE "INTOXICATING LIQUORS."

To the EDITOR OF THE PUBLIC LEDGER.

SIR: In the editorial published in your issue of the 30th instant, referring to Senator PENROSE'S desire to see the prohibition enforcement transferred from the Bureau of Internal Revenue to the Department of Justice you very rightly remark "that some radical changes are necessary and will be agreed upon unless the Nation is going to suffer indefinitely the demoralization of witnessing the almost universal flouting of a law which has been embedded in the Constitution itself."

Permit me to state, however, that the transfer referred to would not improve the situation and would aggravate it, perhaps, by imposing upon the Department of Justice the necessity of enforcing a law the fundamental feature of which, the proportion of alcohol required to render a beverage intoxicating, remains undetermined. Indeed, while estimates in the various States vary from one-half to 3.4 per cent by volume, the Federal one-half per cent has no scientific support and is, therefore, indefensible—at least honorably.

Physicians are the sole legitimate arbiters in such circumstances; yet they consider those members of their profession who study the mode of action of drugs upon the body, the "pharmacologists" and teachers of therapeutics, as the only experts capable of ascertaining with precision just the meaning of "intoxicating liquors" in respect to their alcohol content. Again, they would hold that in determining so momentous a question the opinion of many such should alone prevail. Hence the fact that, although a teacher of pharmacology and therapeutics, I submit, instead of personal observations, the results of researches published by many authorities of the class mentioned. These may be summarized as follows:

First. There is absolutely no scientifi ground for the ruling of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of February 6, 1919, which makes it unlawful for a beverage to contain more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. This act has been imposed upon the American public and submerged in a maze of legal technicalities without regard for scientific accuracy. It misrepresents the meaning of "intoxicating liquors" left open in the eighteenth amendment.

Second. It has been experimentally demonstrated that dilutions of alcohol not exceeding 3 per cent by volume can not produce intoxication. The great volume of fluid ingested makes it impossible to accumulate enough alcohol in the body at a given time to intoxicate. Light beers, ciders, and other beverages containing not more than 3 per cent of alcohol per volume would, therefore, meet the aims of the eighteenth amendment.

Third. Light wines containing not more than 5 per cent of alcohol by volume are likewise nonintoxicating. The quantity required to intoxicate would not only be excessive, but the presence in the wine of tannates, ethers, essential oils, etc., tends to disturb the alimentary tract when such quantities are ingested. Light wines containing not more than 5 per cent of alcohol per volume would also, therefore, meet the purposes of the eighteenth amendment.

Fourth. In nonintoxicating doses or quantities alcohol possesses several therapeutic properties: (a) It promotes the defensive efficiency of the body against disease; (b) it increases the intake of oxygen; (c) it promotes the action of the heart and circulation; and (d) it enhances the processes through which fatigue wastes are broken down and evokes a feeling of comfort and well being. Indeed, it thus fulfills the Biblical teaching that—

"He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle and herb for the service of man, that he may bring forth food out of the earth and wine that maketh glad the heart of man."—Psalm civ, 14, 15.

You also state very appropriately: "Law-abiding people, whether they approve of the amendment or not, are in entire unity with the proposition that it is fatal to public morals to maintain on the statute books laws that are not enforced or which are in such universal contempt that their enforcement is impracticable. In some sections of the country the prohibition enactments are perilously near that condition; juries refuse to convict violators even when the proofs of guilt are conclusive, and foolish technicalities of legal procedure are everywhere invoked to make convictions as difficult as possible."

It is my firm belief that those of our people who are law abiding in all other directions would likewise be so in respect to prohibition if their rights were not imposed upon by the one-half of 1 per cent ruling which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue could not support by a single scientific fact. It is the rock which is sinking the prohibition ship, because it is based upon misrepresentation and strikes equally the innocent and the guilty.

When relieved of this incubus, the prohibition amendment will find sufficient support among the steadily growing millions of its enemies to insure its perpetuation. This support will come from those who fully realize what the abuse of alcohol means in the way of misery, neglect, starvation, disorder, crime, and disease, and how great is the need of legislation to prevent it, but who also insist upon the truth as represented by the voice of science, which teaches that the well being and other benefits a nonintoxicating 3 per cent beer or 5 per cent wine confers upon a fatigued workingman are assets which should be respected.

C. E. DEM. SAJOUS, M. D.

PHILADELPHIA, May 31, 1921.

AMERICAN THERAPEUTIC SOCIETY,
June 27, 1921.

Hon. JOHN J. KINDRED.

DEAR MR. KINDRED: At the request of Dr. Noble P. Barnes, I am sending you the resolution adopted by the American Therapeutic Society at its last annual meeting, which is as follows:

"Whereas the use of ethyl alcohol and its preparations for medicinal and surgical purposes is not only justified, but also indicated by observations made by laboratory investigations and clinical experience: Be it

"Resolved by the members of the American Therapeutic Society in convention assembled, That alcohol has a proper place in the treatment of disease; and be it further

"Resolved, That the least possible restrictions in the use of this drug compatible with the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment be imposed on the members of the medical profession; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the proper authorities."

Very truly, yours,

LEWIS H. TAYLOR,
Secretary American Therapeutic Society.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLASSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I take great pleasure, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] said, in rising in opposition to this particular bill. I have never been in favor of the Volstead national prohibition act. My district is not in favor of it. We are honest up there, and we come out and say and do and act as if we were not in favor of it. I do not believe in any legislation of any kind that tends to regulate how our doctors and the medical profession shall prescribe for their patients. I think it is beyond the power of any legislative body and of Congress to regulate the amount of alcohol that is to be used in beer, at least in the treatment of people who are sick. What right have you men of the House, admitting the lack of knowledge of the subject, to regulate the practice of medicine?

The American Federation of Labor has voted 100 per cent in favor of the use of beer and light wines.

You gentlemen who are now prohibitionists will find that you have reached your last line, as Hindenberg reached his. This is your Marne, as it was his. You will be thrown back as he was. You can not fool all of the people all of the time. You have gone as far as you possibly can go. Possibly you will carry this bill through to-day by a vote of 2 or 3 to 1, and this amendment to the Volstead national prohibition act will temporarily become a law.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RYAN. No; I do not yield.

Mr. BLANTON The gentleman, of course, is in favor of the Constitution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RYAN. Not at all. Of course, I am in favor of the Constitution. I am in favor of any legislative act that should be enacted by this body and that could be enforced.

Up in New York we have a saying, "Where can we get good liquor?" The answer is, "At the police station or at the national prohibition headquarters." [Laughter.] The only place where we do not have good beer is New York. We can not get it there; but you can get it in Washington and in Texas. [Laughter.] But the people up there will rise up, no matter what Members of this House think, and when they vote 100 per cent in favor of beer and light wines their wishes must be respected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, would it not be in order to ask unanimous consent that all Members who address the House may revise and extend their remarks, and that all Members who desire to insert their remarks in the RECORD may do so?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would be proper to do so provided the gentleman could get time from one of the gentlemen who control the time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say a word on this proposition, but I have sat here and listened for hours—to what? To the same tale of woe that we have listened to every time any proposed prohibition legislation has been up for consideration, and then at last the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN] takes the floor and tells us that the people of New York are not going to enforce this law and that the people of New York have determined that this law shall not be enforced. Good God, gentlemen of this Congress, has it come to this, that the people of the city of New York will rise up and tell this Nation that they will not permit the law to be enforced? I say to these people from New York it is not a question of what communities may think, it is a question of what the Nation thinks. Ah, the day of secession is past. There was a time when our fathers divided in this Hall, when they each went their way, but to-day this Union is stronger and greater than any of its parts, and under that flag I believe that any law that this Congress passes, which is constitutional, can be, should be, and will be enforced. [Applause.]

The same communities and largely the same men who fought the eighteenth amendment, who fought woman suffrage, and who fought the Volstead enforcement law, are fighting this measure. They are fundamentally opposed to prohibition. At one time they contended for the open saloon. To-day there is not a man here who will stand up in his place and advocate the return of the old saloon. These gentlemen would repeal the eighteenth amendment, if possible; they would repeal the Volstead enforcement law, if possible; they openly state that they and their constituents believe in liberalizing and weakening the law at every opportunity. It is insisted that the law can not be enforced in certain localities because the sentiment in that locality is not favorable to the enforcement. I concede that there are certain communities where the majority of the people do not sanction any law affecting or regulating the liquor traffic.

The eighteenth amendment was passed by the Sixty-fifth Congress. That amendment was ratified by 45 out of the 48 States. The Volstead Enforcement Act was passed by the Sixty-sixth Congress, and this bill to-day will be passed by the Sixty-seventh Congress. No snap judgments have been taken. These votes, extending over a period of years, express the deliberate judgment of the American people. The strongest opposition to the enforcement of this law comes from those cities having a large foreign population; and the sooner these people learn that this is a land where majorities rule the better it will be for them and for the country. It is unthinkable that men will in these halls openly oppose the carrying into effect and enforcement of a law whose sole and only purpose is to carry out a part of our Constitution. It is not a question of whether one favors prohibition, light wine, and beer, or what not. The fact is that the Constitution prohibits the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, therefore it becomes the duty of this Congress to pass appropriate enforcement statutes; and he who opposes the enactment of all enforcement laws is not true to his trust and either fails to appreciate or openly disregards his oath of office.

The legislation being considered to-day is not an innovation. Nothing really new is suggested, and the principal points covered were presumed to be covered when the original enforcement act was passed, and these proposed provisions have been enforced since the national prohibition has been enforced; and had it not been for Attorney General Palmer's opinion rendered on March 3, 1921, this legislation would not be before the Congress. The Sixty-fifth Congress never intended, in the passage of the Volstead Act, to permit the indiscriminate prescribing of beer as a medicine. The national enforcing officer interpreted the statute as intended by Congress, so that the passage of this legislation will not take away any privileges, in so far as beer is concerned, which have been enjoyed since the prohibition enforcement act took effect.

Little has been said on this floor supporting any claim that beer is necessary as a medicine. In this connection it is well to remember that the Judiciary Committee held exhaustive hearings on this matter. All interests were permitted to present their views. The only person appearing before the committee seriously advocating the use of beer as a medicine was one Dr. John P. Davin, of New York City. The reading of his testimony, found at page 58 of the hearings, will convince one of the fallacy of his arguments. Beer has never been recognized by the United States Pharmacopœial Convention as a therapeutic agent. Leading physicians everywhere throughout the land make no claim that beer is a medicine. Numerous medical State societies urge the passage of this act. Many druggists' associations favor the passage of the act. Legitimate drug stores do not want to become open saloons, legitimate physicians do not want to become barkeepers. If beer is intoxicating, then it can not be lawfully sold as a beverage and should not be prescribed for the thirsty unless it is necessary as a medicine. Proof is overwhelming that it is not necessary as a medicine, and in my opinion the manufacture of the so-called light wine and beer would not be lawful under the eighteenth amendment. If these beverages are intoxicating in fact, then they surely are prohibited, and when the "kick" is removed from beer and wine the advocates of light wine and beer have no further use for the beverage.

In this connection it is interesting to note the attitude of the great brewers of the country, as expressed by Mr. Oliver T. Remners, attorney for Anheuser-Busch. Mr. Remners appeared before the committee and read a carefully prepared statement, and among other things he said:

As attorney for Anheuser-Busch (Inc.), of St. Louis, formerly the largest manufacturer of beer in the world, without relinquishing the principle we have always maintained, I am authorized to speak in favor of the enactment of this amendment forbidding the manufacture and sale of beer for medicinal purposes.

Again, Mr. Remners says:

Authorization of the sale of beer for medicinal purposes under the provisions of the present enforcement act will make it absolutely impossible to enforce the prohibition laws. While we are unalterably opposed to the principles of prohibition, we insist that since the principle of prohibition has been written into the Constitution and the Statutes, the law should be enforced to the letter fearlessly, fairly, and with impartiality. It will be only by the enforcement of all the prohibition laws so stringently that everybody—rich and poor alike—will be denied the use of alcoholic liquor that the American people, after a full and fair trial, will determine in their sober, solemn second judgment whether they want to continue its operation or whether they want to amend or repeal it. It is our position that every law should be submitted to such a fair and impartial test, regardless of how that law affects our business interests.

This advocate in the brewers' interests also says:

Thousands upon thousands of places will spring up for the handling of medicinal beer for the health, and even an army of prohibition enforcement officers would be powerless to cope with the situation.

This same authority also observes:

If the issue before the committee was one of prohibition or anti-prohibition, we should be here to fight prohibition, because we are opposed to prohibition as a principle, but the question before you is not a question of prohibition or antiprohibition; it is a question of whether the law as it was decreed by the lawmaking authorities of the American Nation shall be fairly and honestly enforced or be trampled under foot.

After some argument in reference to the medicinal value of beer, Mr. Remners concludes:

There is, therefore, no excuse for the sale of beer for medicinal purposes. If the patient needs alcohol, the physician can prescribe it. If he needs merely a tonic, he can get that without the alcohol. All this can be done and the dignity and security of our laws preserved.

I have quoted very liberally from Mr. Remner's statement, the same being found at pages 39 to 50 of the hearings.

Mr. Christian Fiegenspan, president of the United States Brewers' Association, says:

In days gone by it was Private Seal that quenched your thirst, steadied your nerves after a hard day's work, built you up in periods of recuperation. Private Seal, as mellow and tasty as ever, is still at your service. Tests have shown that its tasty and body-building qualities remain unchanged.

Another brewer proclaiming that in beer containing less than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol the body-building qualities remain unchanged.

I have called particular attention to these statements because of the source from which they come. The brewers of the country would not state that beer was not necessary as a medicine if it was necessary. In 38 States of the Union prohibition laws now in force prohibit the prescribing of beer as a medicine. Not a drop of beer for medicine has been legally prescribed for over 15 months, and the good health of the people has not perceptibly declined. Under the present law physicians must procure permits in order that they may be permitted to prescribe whisky or brandy, and it is interesting to note that out of the 152,627 physicians in the United States 78 per cent have not taken out permits, thereby refusing to prescribe liquor in any form. In 24 States no physician has a permit to prescribe liquor. Four out of every five physicians in the entire country do not use liquor in medicinal practice. Why, then, should we at this late date proclaim beer as a medicine?

There has been little controversy about the other features of this bill.

One provision placed in the bill by the committee is, in my mind, of the utmost importance if this law is to be honestly enforced, and that is the provision which will tend to relieve us from the patent medicine scandal in the country. In the passage of the enforcement act it was thought that sections 4 and 5 would take care of this situation, but to the amazement of all it has been found that many patent medicines and even hair tonics, the formulas for the manufacture of which have been determined by the chemists of the Internal Revenue Department to be unfit for beverage use, are in fact fit for beverage use and are being used extensively as intoxicating beverages. Indeed, the hearings before the committee disclosed the fact that patent medicines and other preparations are being sold for beverage purposes in pool rooms and other places over the bar and by the drink. Many affidavits have been filed with the enforcement officers showing these facts. Yet these officers insist that sections 4 and 5, above referred to, do not lodge in the authorities the right to demand a change of the formulas and this makes it very difficult to bring about the cancellation of the permits permitting the manufacture of the beverages. It is true that the man who sells this class of beverage by the drink may be arrested, but the Government has no chance to make the manufacturer of these fake medicines change his formulas or cancel the permit. It is obvious that the sensible thing to do, if results are desired, is to cut off the supply. This bill provides for this very thing, and at the same time safeguards legitimate industry. I might say in this connection that I am one member of the Committee on the Judiciary who was not in sympathy with all of the provisions of H. R. 5033, the original supplemental enforcement bill introduced into the present Congress. There were provisions in that bill which were rightly objected to by legitimate industry, and be it to the credit of the committee that after careful consideration had been given to these claims, these objectionable features as soon as discovered were unanimously eliminated, and as one who comes from a dry district in a dry State—a district and a State that believe in the enforcement of the law—I have no hesitancy in advocating the passage of this bill as presented. The eighteenth amendment is a permanent part of our basic law. The enforcement statute will never be repealed and the beneficent effects of this great moral reform will become more apparent as the days and years go by.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, we have heard many sorts of argument during the last few years against the national prohibition amendment and against the Volstead law, which was enacted to provide for its enforcement; but it struck me as quite unusual when the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN], who addressed us a few moments ago, boasted of the fact that he and his district were in favor of its violation. I wonder whether the gentleman from New York would have the temerity to rise in his place as a Member of this House and advocate the violation and the open flaunting of any other law of the United States or any other constitutional provision of the United States. Yet I suppose he would, if honest with himself, admit that this constitutional amendment known as the eighteenth amendment is just as sacred and just as binding and of just as much force as any other, and that it was perhaps adopted more unanimously than any other amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not yield; I have not the time. This amendment to the Volstead law is in the nature of emergency legislation. I doubt very seriously—though I have no right to speak with authority on the subject—whether the gentleman from New York voices the sentiment of his own district in the statement he has made, but if he does, I would remind him that his own State, only a few months ago, under the leadership of a governor of his own political party, enacted a very stringent law to provide for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. I wonder whether he would be willing to arise in the Legislature of New York and advocate the open violation of the law of the State of New York. I have very serious doubt that he would.

Now, this is in the nature of emergency legislation. Except for the decision of the Attorney General, it might be that this legislation would not be here. I have no intention of criticizing the decision of the Attorney General, because I am sure he acted in good faith. Whether his interpretation of the law was correct or incorrect, we are confronted with a serious situation, and if that interpretation is carried out, the breweries of the United States will reopen for the manufacture of intoxicating beer; and if they reopen for the manufacture of intoxicating beer, then the saloons will all reopen for the sale of intoxicating beer. This will mean the open and flagrant nullification of a part of our Constitution. Gentlemen who proclaim themselves as against the Volstead law and against the eighteenth amendment say they rejoice in the fact that the saloon has been abolished, but that, on the contrary, they are in favor of the sale of light wines and beer. There can be no such thing as the sale of light wines and beer in the United States for beverage purposes without reopening the saloons of the United States. [Applause.] Any man who expresses himself as being in favor of the promiscuous sale of light wines and beer ought to go further and be honest with himself and with us and say that he is in favor of the reopening of the saloons all over the United States. That is what he means. He can not mean anything else.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman is so insistent that I will yield.

Mr. HILL. How about the promiscuous sale of cider all over the United States? Has that meant the reopening of the saloons?

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, the promiscuous sale of cider is not worrying the gentleman from Maryland. It is beer that he is interested in.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I can not yield further.

Mr. HILL. But the gentleman did not answer my question.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought I did.

Mr. HILL. I asked if the promiscuous sale of cider throughout the United States had meant the reopening of the saloons?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; because the saloons never existed for the sale of cider, and they do not exist now for the sale of cider; but, if the gentleman knows anything about human nature and about the nature of those who are now seeking to bring about the repeal of the Volstead law or its promiscuous violation, he knows that what they desire is the reopening of the saloons for the sale of beer and wine.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman——

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not yield any further. If the saloons are to be reopened under the law for the sale of wine and beer, there is no power under heaven that can prevent them from selling whisky.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. The gentleman and I are both from Kentucky. Would he not rather see an old Kentucky colonel drink his 100 per cent whisky than to see a pot-bellied German drinking a keg of beer? [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to my friend and colleague from Kentucky that if I were compelled to witness either one I should prefer the Kentucky colonel. [Applause.] There is no more reason or excuse for the violation of the Constitution by the sale of beer than by the sale of whisky.

Now, it is a ridiculous situation, for nobody under heaven with even a layman's smattering of medical sense will proclaim that beer is a medicine. I have no doubt that if the Congress had known in advance that the Attorney General's office would rule that under the law beer could be prescribed as a medicine we would have provided against that in the original Volstead law. There is no sort of doubt about that. There never was a time in the history of the United States when beer was regarded as a medicine in the ordinary sense to be prescribed by a physician. The ordinary prescription that is given by a physician is carried to a drug store to be prepared and filled. Are the drug stores to be transformed into beer gardens?

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have only 10 minutes, but I will yield to my genial friend from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman ought not to say that he never heard of any physician prescribing beer. Is it not a fact that thousands upon thousands of physicians have prescribed malt and beer for nursing mothers?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, no; I do not think beer is recognized as a preseribable medicine for illness for mothers or others. There may be physicians who would prescribe it if their patients asked them to do so.

Mr. SABATH. There are thousands and thousands of physicians who have prescribed it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Sure. There are a few physicians who are always willing to prescribe anything that their patients want. [Laughter.]

I challenge the gentleman to find a single provision of a standard recognized medical work which says that beer is a medicine.

Mr. SABATH. Here is the gentleman from New York, a distinguished physician who addressed the House, who has 30 years' experience, who says that it is.

Mr. KINDRED. If the gentleman will yield, the American Therapeutical Association, made up of some of the most distinguished physicians in the country, protest against this measure on the ground that beer, ale, and porter are medicines.

Mr. BARKLEY. And, on the contrary, I submit that the American Medical Association, the highest recognized medical authority in the United States, proclaims against the prescription of alcohol in any form for any kind of a disease.

Mr. KINDRED. I assure the gentleman that he is mistaken in his interpretation.

Mr. BARKLEY. That was the last official act upon the subject, taken in 1917.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The undisputed testimony in the hearings before the Judiciary Committee from the most experienced experts agreed that nothing more harmful to mother and child could be given than beer or any other intoxicating liquor.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the medical profession among those recognized as reputable physicians the almost unanimous verdict is against prescribing alcohol in any form as medicine. But this bill and the original law permit and provide for the use of spirituous and vinous liquors as medicine.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. FOSTER. The testimony taken before the committee included a telegram representing 4,500 physicians in Ohio protesting against its use as a medicine.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the gentleman will yield, I will present this for the information of the gentleman from Kentucky. I have here a protest signed by 43 physicians in one county of Pennsylvania asking Congress to do something that will prohibit them from being drafted as bartenders.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have received the same protest. There are many States of the Union which have their own laws prohibiting the prescribing of any kind of liquor as a medicine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BARKLEY. Gentleman, this law ought to be passed by unanimous consent. I see my eloquent friend from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] chuckling. I wonder if the gentleman would seriously think that Congress ought to make it possible for any class of men, medical or otherwise, to violate the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly not.

Mr. BARKLEY. Or that they should violate any law passed by Congress?

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly not. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Now, what these gentlemen seek to do is not to have beer prescribed as beer for a medicine, but what they seek to do is to make an entering wedge in the prohibition laws of the Nation so that ultimately there may be created a sentiment against its observance and in favor of its violation. [Applause.] That propaganda is going all over the country. You can not go to a moving-picture show but what you see flashed upon the screen something that seeks to make the enforcement of the prohibition law ridiculous. You can not pick up a metropolitan newspaper without seeing somewhere great headlines seeking to make the prohibition law ridiculous; seeking to create an impression that the sentiment among the people of the Nation is in favor of its violation. There is nothing more vicious, more insinuating, more undermining, than this propoganda going on from one end of the country to the other seeking to undermine the sentiment of the people in favor of the enforcement of a constitutional amendment. I predict that the propaganda will fail now as it has failed heretofore, because 45 States of the Union which have ratified the amendment, and more than two-thirds of the Representatives of the people, who are in favor of it, will be here for years to come to see that it is enforced and strengthened wherever it may be needed to be enforced and strengthened. [Applause.] Congress can not ignore the will of the American people. Congress will not lend its influence or encouragement to the propaganda of lawlessness which certain interests are engaged in fostering. The people have spoken on this subject. Their will is supreme. They have placed this amendment in the Constitution of their country, and the sooner certain small portions of the country understand that the people of the Nation as a whole demand its enforcement, the better it will be for them and for the Nation at large. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I regret exceedingly that the limitation necessarily placed on my time by the chairman of the committee will not give me an opportunity to say what I would like to say with reference to the pending measure. The bill being considered is, of course, of very great interest not only to the membership of the House but to the Nation at large. But I am forced to utilize the few minutes granted me, not to speak particularly of the legislation, but of the history of this legislation, which I think discloses a centralization of power menacing not alone to the functioning of the House, but a menace to the legislative needs of the people.

It is to be regretted that any man on the floor of Congress will boast of representing a people who are in favor of the violation of the law founded upon the constitutional amendment, as did the gentleman from New York. [Applause.] There was a time in this Nation when everybody looked upon law enforcement entrusted to the Federal Government as so drastic that nobody could escape its penalties. In my judgment, the lax enforcement of the prohibition law, especially among the foreign elements of America, has done more to bring discredit upon the Government of the United States than anything that has occurred in recent years. [Applause.] And in the face of that sentiment we have had one of the high officers of this Nation, the chief law officer of the Nation, if you please, make a disguised attempt to defeat the purposes of the people of the United States as expressed in the eighteenth amendment by a beer provision with reference to medicine that makes a farce out of the Constitution and a farce out of its enforcement. [Applause.]

The Committee on the Judiciary sought to protect that in answer to demands from all over the Nation by removing the weaknesses of the original Volstead Act, as disclosed by experience, by additional legislation. Even though I am a member of that committee, I think I may be pardoned for saying that the Judiciary Committee is one of the great committees of this House. Its personnel will compare favorably with the personnel of any other committee of the House. It comprehends such men as the distinguished chairman, Mr. VOLSTEAD, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER], the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], the gentleman from Virginia [Gov. MONTAGUE], and other men of like experience and like ability. That committee in response to a Nation-wide demand, in the intolerable heat of a committee room, sat for three weeks, calling men and women from all parts of the Nation to gather views as to the necessity for additional enforcement legislation.

After hearing testimony for three weeks these gentlemen of poise, of ability, and legislative experience went over the legislation and reported to this House a bill. You all know that under the peculiar conditions of the rules of this House to attempt to get through a controversial piece of legislation such as a prohibitory law on Calendar Wednesday would prove abortive. You have only two Wednesdays before you must surrender the right under the rules of Calendar Wednesday, until a new call may be had. Gentlemen are all familiar with the fact that by filibuster it would have been impossible to consider that bill on the floor of the House effectively under any of the regular rules of this House. Consequently, the chairman of the committee [Mr. VOLSTEAD] appealed to the Rules Committee for a special rule, and what I say I say in all kindness, and there is nothing personal about it; but in my judgment the centralization of power in the Rules Committee is a menace to legislation in this body. The Rules Committee started hearings. On what? To find out whether there was a demand for the legislation? Oh, no; not that. To ascertain whether or not the legislation would meet the situation and whether the legislative condition of the House would permit it, in fact, to have the bill considered? Not that. The Rules Committee started on a little hearing of its own on a bill that had been reported after three weeks of hearings from one of the great committees of this House, to determine what? Whether the legislation was meritorious, whether the legislation should be passed by this House, whether the committee from which the legislation emanated was trustworthy, and they decided what? The individual members of the Committee on Rules decided that they were not in favor of the legislation, and, therefore, they stifled it. Mr. Speaker, there are many men on the floor of this House who were not in favor of that legislation, but few who oppose it would have the blatant egotism to declare that because they are opposed to it, therefore the House of Representatives has no power to hear it. [Applause.] The question of whether this bill should be enacted into law is the function of this House; it is not the function of the Rules Committee; and I say to you that it is a menace to a Republic when a half dozen men can sit as censors over the bills reported by great committees of this House and, if they do not approve them, determine that the House shall never have the opportunity of even considering the legislation. Mr. Speaker, there was a time in this country when we had what we called Cannonism, a time when there was a revolt all over the Nation because of the centralization of power in the hands of one man. So far as any controversial legislation is concerned that may come before this House, the only difference between that day and this is that the power now is in the hands of about six men, who assume to usurp the functions of this House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not also the autocracy of the Committee on Rules that forces this bill before the House under a suspension of the rules, requiring a two-thirds vote instead of a majority vote?

Mr. REAVIS. Oh, that follows as the practical operation of one of the evils; but here is the proposition: The Rules Committee not only told the great Judiciary Committee what it could not do but it told that committee what it could do, and after censoring the bill that this committee after three weeks' hearing reported to this House, which the Rules Committee decided the House should not have a chance to consider, the chairman of the Committee on Rules introduced his own bill containing a section or two of the original bill and notified the Committee on the Judiciary that they might consider or report that out. Let me repeat that what I say I say in all kindness and that there is nothing personal in this from my standpoint. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] the other day very correctly stated that the functioning of the Rules Committee and the character of rules that have been brought on the floor of this House made the House innocuous. In this instance it makes one of your great committees absolutely puerile. It is unsafe and unwise that the power to stifle legislation should be reposed in a half dozen out of 435 legislators. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, some of the gentlemen have laid stress upon a comment that was made here to-day with respect to the attitude of the people of my State upon this bill and on prohibition generally. I shall not go into the matter except to say that the people of New York State can be relied upon to respect the law. Any statute which is passed by this House and approved in regular order will receive at least the respect, even though it may not receive the approval, of the people of New York.

It is only fair, however, to say that prohibition is not, and never will be, popular in the Empire State. Its population, particularly that of the great metropolis, like that of all great industrial and commercial centers, is made up of many racial strains.

DIETARY CUSTOMS.

The foreign population and their descendants in our large cities have become used to certain dietary customs. The Latin elements, for instance, have become accustomed to light wines, which, as is universally known, they use with moderation as a part of their meals instead of tea or coffee.

The Teutons use beer in similar manner. Those from the British Isles have a predilection for ales and porters. In the opinion of these people these lighter stimulants are useful and beneficial adjuncts to diet. Native Americans, too, have gradually adopted these beverages and have come to look upon them as essential. To take these lighter beverages away by the power of the State is little short of a national calamity. It has made the American workman sullen and discontented. It has made the foreign-born citizen rebellious. We hear much to-day of propaganda to Americanize our adopted citizens. I know of nothing which has contributed more to make the foreign-born unsympathetic to our institutions than this prohibition legislation. To take from him a personal liberty which he and his forebears enjoyed, even under the most tyrannical of monarchies, seems to his mind incongruous and incomprehensible in a land which he has always been taught to believe was the land of the free.

THE POOR MAN'S BEVERAGE.

It was once a common sight to see the laborer stop his work at the noon hour, send for his can of beer, and, sitting on scaffolding or bare sidewalk, drink the humble beverage as a part of his midday meal. When his frugal repast was over he would return to his pick and shovel, his hammer and saw, with renewed strength and vigor. At night, when his work was done, he would have his beer at his evening meal in the midst of his family. It was not the laboring man who patronized the licentious cabaret or the all-night road house, where strong liquor debased men and ruined women. If drink conquered, it was in such places and in the homes of wealth and fashion.

There is a very old verse which runs as follows:

The rich man has his cellar
And ready butler by him;
The poor must steer for his pint of beer
Where a saint can't choose but spy him.
The rich man's curtained windows
Hide the concerts of the quality;
The poor must share a cracked fiddle in the air,
Which offends all sound morality.

If any workingman fell from grace, you may rest assured it was not through beer.

WHISKY DRINKING ENCOURAGED BY PROHIBITION.

Where light stimulants are used whisky drinking never flourishes. To-day whisky drinking has become a public scandal. Young men and young women who never before thought of whisky now drink it openly. To-day they open a bottle of whisky costing $10 or $12 as a matter of bravado, as would-be sports used to open up champagne at $5 a bottle.

The ardor of alcoholic appetite is a factor in enhancing the price of strong drink and tempts the commercial instinct of men to pursue an enterprise which promises large profits. The reformers played right into the hands of the forces they aimed to circumvent. If they had let beer and wine alone and struck at whisky and the saloon, at which the bulk of the people of this land thought they were aiming, there would be no such thing to-day as the prohibition question. The saloons are still open, doing a more flourishing business than ever before. They are getting more for their whisky than their predecessors used to get for high-priced French wines. And who supports these so-called brothels of iniquity? Why, the workingman, whose beer was taken away for his moral uplift and improvement.

THE PHYSICIAN AND BEER.

Now, under the terms of this latest bill it is proposed to deny the use of beer as an aid to medicine. It is proposed to deny to physicians the right to prescribe beer in the treatment of their patients. I will very readily believe that the doctors do not want the right to prescribe beers. I will very readily believe that the druggists do not desire to keep beers as a part of their medicinal supplies. But all of that, of which so much has been made here to-day, is beside the point. Beer is not a medicine and no one can reasonably say that it is. Doctors usually prescribe it as an aid to diet—in the same sense as they order their patients to drink water, milk, take exercise, or avoid the use of certain meats and vegetables. Even Dr. Harvey W. Wiley is dragooned to join the chorus of sophistry. He said very solemnly at one of the hearings (May 20–21, p. 296):

I have never seen a prescription written by a physician which included beer as one of its elements.

Of course he did not, and no one else did, either. Neither did he see a prescription which prescribed milk "as one of its elements" for the very good reason that such beverages come under the head of general dietary instructions given to the patient orally and not in writing. So all the hubbub about whether or not beer is a medicine is only a straw man put up to be knocked down.

The real point in the controversy is how men can become so narrow and short sighted as to meddle at all with a profession so sacred as that of the physician's and undertake to dictate to him what he shall or shall not recommend for the alleviation of human suffering. There lies the outrage against common sense and liberty. We have allowed, and will continue to allow, the physician to prescribe morphine, cocaine, heroin, arsenic, strychnine, and other deadly drugs. Under this latest effusion of fanaticism—the bill before us—the physician is left carte blanche to deal out the deadliest drugs in the pharmacopœia, but—consistency, thou art truly a jewel—he must not recommend his patient to take a glass of beer or porter!

THE FORCE OF PUBLIC OPINION.

At the hearing on this bill Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler, the general counsel and "legislative superintendent"—yes, that is his title; he superintends legislation in this Congress—well, he said to the committee:

Recently I was in Maine, the first State that adopted prohibition, and there met the sheriff and the officers, and they were making their request of that legislature, after 60 years' experience, for new legislation to meet the devices and schemes that had been worked out by the liquor interests to evade the law there.

There, sirs, what better evidence can you have than that to show the utter futility of attempting to thwart men's appetites? Before you can devise a workable enforcement measure you must first reconstruct human nature. Mr. Wheeler is receiving a munificent salary for his zeal. He will be back here next year and possibly for many years to come demanding further supplemental amendments to the Volstead Act, and in the meantime his salary will go on and on. Verily it pays to be a reformer.

The fact is that the American people will never become reconciled to the eighteenth amendment. It was foisted on them while 4,000,000 of our voting population were in arms preoccupied in the defense of our flag. It was represented as only intended to abolish the saloons, and that it was directed chiefly against strong drink. The amendment, as submitted to Congress and to the legislatures of the respective States, gave no intimation as to what alcoholic content would debar a beverage from sale and consumption, and it was never believed that Congress would pass or that the Supreme Court of the United States would ever sustain a measure so utterly unreasonable as the Volstead Enforcement Act.

Why complain now about its enforcement? Its very rigor invites evasion and corruption.

The truth of the matter is that no law can ever be enforced that has not the general concurrence of public opinion. The ancient legislators recognized that as a basic fact. Before legislative bodies existed or statutes were enacted custom was the law, and according to a strict jurisprudence no law should be enacted that has not the sanction of custom.

SUMPTUARY LEGISLATION.

According to Bentham, obedience to law is founded on fear. That seems to be the notion which the prohibitionists have adopted. It may work out all right in dealing with crimes prompted by vicious or debased natures, but it is a poor restraint indeed in reference to artificial crimes, not involving moral turpitude, invented by intolerance. It was a crime at one time in England for a laborer to wear the vest or sack coat of a squire or titled gentleman. That was when the intolerable sumptuary laws prescribed the clothing a man should or should not wear. Such laws were, no doubt, obeyed; but were they respected? Now comes intolerance again in new guise and foists upon us sumptuary laws telling us what we should or should not drink.

OUR WEAKER BROTHER.

The eighteenth amendment punishes the innocent instead of the guilty. To protect the sot, it deprives the toiler, the aged and the infirm, and the temperate self-respecting citizen of a form of refreshment to which their whole lives have become attuned.

Why so much solicitude about the weaker brother? If he has an appetite for drink it is no worse than the lust of the flesh and has caused, beyond comparison, less misery, less disgrace, and less dishonor. The divorce evil is a thousand times worse. The drink habit kills its victim. So does lust. The drink addict may be odious, but what more loathsome, and yet pitiable, than the man upon whom syphilis has set its death mark? The drunkard humiliates his family, but the libertine disgraces them. Why then select this one vice as the subject of legislation and let other vices run rampant?

It is argued by criminologists that all crime is a form of weakness. Yet that deduction does not prompt them to remove all restraint or punishment. Legislators have written down drunkenness as a crime, and so it is—a filthy crime, degrading to the offender and the source of untold suffering and misery to innocent women and children. Yet such has been the neglect of our moral teaching that it has been treated with strange indulgence. The surest way to provoke a laugh in the vaudeville or in the movies, even to-day, is to display the antics of a maudlin drunkard. Consequently, young men, in bravado, to provoke the admiration of their chums, will boast of their drinking bouts. The evil therefore is and has been in the moral attitude of society and in the neglect to enforce the laws already in existence against this insidious and degrading vice.

PUNISHING THE THING INSTEAD OF THE PERSON.

It is a poor plan to punish the thing instead of the person. Formerly if a bull gored a man it was put to death and its flesh could not be eaten. The modern reactionary has come back to the old philosophy, which paraphrased must read, "If whisky hurts, it shall be destroyed." The modern philosophy is that the thing is innocent of guilt; the man who misuses it is the real offender; and if he is so weak that he can not be trusted he should be put under restraint.

But our friends on the other side retort, "The thing itself is bad." That, I think, they must admit is purely a matter of opinion. The hearings on this bill contain a mass of medical authorities purporting to show that alcohol is injurious to the human system. It is obvious, however, that pains were taken to use only the witnesses favorable to their contention. I will print here, under the leave extended, the opinions of medical men of the highest authority holding the view that alcoholic stimulants are wholesome and beneficial:

MEDICAL OPINIONS FAVORABLE TO ALCOHOL.

Sir William Osler, formerly of Oxford University: "In moderation wine, beer, and spirits may be taken throughout a long life without impairing the general health. I should be sorry to give up the use of alcohol in the severer forms of enteric fever."

Dr. William Edward Fitch, of the Vanderbilt Clinic: "It is the opinion of careful students of the subject that the moderate use of alcohol in health is harmless. It undoubtedly has a place in disease. There are reasons for believing that alcohol actually increases the resisting powers of the body to the poisonous toxins of septic fever."

Dr. Charles Gilmore Kerley, of the New York Polyclinic School and Hospital: "Alcohol is occasionally of great service in diseases of children. Under certain conditions it answers better than any other means of stimulation."

Dr. L. Emmett Holt, of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York: "With many nursing women the use of malted liquors—ale, beer, etc.—increases the quantity of milk and the proportion of fat. There is little doubt that alcohol is at times of much benefit."

Dr. George F. Still, of Kings' College, London: "The value of alcohol in the early stage of severe diarrhea, when there is extreme exhaustion and collapse, is, I think, quite undeniable. I think an unbiased observer must admit that brandy is sometimes very valuable in a bad case of pneumonia."

Dr. Chalmers Watson, of the Royal Infirmary, Edinburg: "There is no question of the undoubted value of alcohol in the treatment of certain diseases, especially in their critical stages."

Dr. Robert Hutchinson, of the London Hospital: "Alcohol certainly spares fat and sometimes carbohydrates and yields heat and energy to the body. Of this fact there no longer is any doubt, and it at once entitles alcohol to rank as a food. Wine used in moderation seems to add to the agreeableness of life, and whatever adds to the agreeableness of life adds to its resources and power."

Dr. William Tibbles, of the Royal Institute of Public Health, London: "Alcohol is primarily an appetizer. Convalescent, debilitated, or aged persons frequently eat more food when it is accompanied by a glass of beer, wine, or diluted spirits. The value of such a beverage to those who need it is admitted by most scientific men. Alcohol is a rapid and trustworthy restorative. In many cases it is truly life preserving owing to its power to sustain cardiac and nervous energy."

Dr. Hobart Amory Hare, of the University of Pennsylvania: "Clinical experience too great to be ignored stands for the continued use of alcohol. The chief uses of the drug are as a rapidly acting equalizer of the circulation and as a systematic support in low fevers and prolonged wasting diseases, in old age, and in convalescence from acute diseases."

Dr. A. A. Brill, of the University of New York: "Alcohol has an undisputed place in the human physiological and psychological economy."

Dr. Charles E. de M. Sajous, of Temple University, Pennsylvania: "Malt liquors—ale, stout, and beer—contain diastase, which aids the digestion of starchy foods. They are especially tonic in effect."

Dr. George F. Butler, of the Chicago College of Medicine and Surgery: "Atonic dyspepsia and weakened digestion are generally benefited by some form of alcohol. As a pure cardiac stimulant alcohol is remarkably serviceable. In certain stages of various acute diseases alcohol is one of the most potent and useful remedies."

Dr. Paul Bartholow, of the Jefferson Medical College: "Beer, ale, and porter are much and justly esteemed as stomachic tonics and restoratives in chronic, wasting diseases. Alcohol is an important remedy in the various forms of pulmonary phthisis. In convalescence from acute diseases there can be no difference of opinion as to the great value of wine as a restorative."

Dr. Samuel O. L. Potter, of the Cooper Medical College, San Francisco: "In anemia and chlorosis good red wines are almost indispensable. It is an absolute necessity in the treatment of lobar pneumonia. In fevers alcohol is often most serviceable. Some physicians agree with Mr. Lawson Tait, who declared himself fully persuaded, after 30 years of life as hard in work and as full of responsibility as well could be, that the moderate use of alcohol is a necessity in our modern life."

Dr. John V. Shoemaker, of the Medico-Chirurgical College of Philadelphia: "Alcohol is in some measure antidotal to the poison of the bacillus tuberculosis, and it is to this fact that its unquestionable value in prolonging life in phthisis is due."

Dr. John H. Musser, of the University of Pennsylvania: "There is, I think, no rational doubt that small doses of alcohol are at times useful with those that are out of health, for their stimulating effect upon the appetite and upon digestion, and occasionally for their effect upon other functions. When solid food can not be taken alcohol is our sheet anchor."

Dr. W. Gilman Thompson, of Cornell University: "There are a number of diseases in which the temporary use of alcohol is of positive service, and there are a number of cases in which it is a positive necessity in order to prolong life. Whatever controversy still exists over the physiological effects of alcohol as a food, it is undeniable that in some cases of disease it is clinically indispensable. The value of alcohol in the treatment of fevers is now universally recognized."

Dr. Robert Hutchinson, of the London Hospital: "'Rough cider'—that is, the completely fermented apple juice—taken in moderation, agrees well with most gouty subjects. The bottled or 'champagne' cider, which is imperfectly fermented, should never be used, owing to its undoubted liability to set up intestinal fermentation. Alcohol is the best possible hypnotic in many cases of chronic, psychic insomnia."

Dr. Binford Throne, writing in Forschheimer's Therapeusis: "All cases of diphtheria have more or less myocarditis, and all should be given stimulants from the first. The best is good whisky or brandy."

Henry L. Elsner, of Syracuse University: "In pneumonia—the experienced know that there are cases in which it is absolutely indicated."

Dr. William H. Smith, of Harvard University: "Influenza: When extension into the lung occurs, supporting measures must be pushed. Alcohol in some form should be given freely."

J. P. Crozier Griffith, of the University of Pennsylvania: "In scarlet fever with cardiac weakness alcohol in some form is one of the most rapid and satisfactory stimulants."

Dr. Julius Grinker, of the Northwestern University Medical School, Chicago: "For the obstinate sleeplessness of chronic cerebral anemia nothing equals in efficacy the imbibition of a night draft, consisting of either a glass of beer, wine, or even whisky in small quantities."

John Ruhrah, of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Baltimore: "In severe cases of smallpox alcohol may be added to the dietary with great advantage."

Dr. Herbert Maxon King, of the Loomis Sanitarium for Tuberculosis, New York: "Small doses of alcohol in the form of wine, beer, or ale with meals will often stimulate a flagging appetite and enable the patient to consume a normal amount of food. When the carbohydrate content of the diet can not be brought up to the desired quantity, the addition of a little wine or beer to the diet may be of distinct advantage. As a stomachic in cases of hypoacidity, loss of appetite, and consequent impairment of digestion, the lighter wines and malt liquors may be prescribed to advantage."

Dr. Frederick C. Shattuck, of Harvard University: "In typhoid fever.—If heart shows signs of undue weakness, I consider it a grave error in judgment to withhold alcohol. The danger of forming the alcohol habit is practically nil in the subjects of acute general infection. They are more likely to acquire a distaste than a liking for it."

Dr. Daniel M. Hoyte, formerly of the University of Pennsylvania: "Alcohol has long been used to abort a cold. The patient takes a hot bath and after getting into bed drinks a hot lemonade containing one or two ounces of whisky. This produces diaphoresis and aids in the elimination of the toxins."

So, after all, it is only a matter of opinion. The error that is made is to select either one as the basis of a constitutional amendment.

WRONG TO ENGRAFT A MOOT POINT INTO LAW.

One side looks at the use, the other at the abuse. Both are right and might continue to hold their respective views and live together in peace and amity if they were content to leave it as a matter of opinion. The evil of the situation is that one side has succeeded in projecting its opinion into our Constitution as a part of the organic law of the country. That, I believe, is fundamentally wrong and in violation of the basic traditions of free government.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman will pardon me, but I have not the time. We have put into the Constitution of the United States the opinion that stimulants should not be used as a beverage, and we have followed it up with the enactment of criminal laws for enforcement of that opinion. This is the first time in our history that our Constitution has been amended so as to limit and curtail human rights. It is the first constitutional amendment which restrains personal liberty.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; I can not yield. Every other amendment to our Constitution, dealing with abstract principles, has since the foundation of this Government been directed toward the enlargement of human rights or the protection of individual liberty. They have all tended toward the protection of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. This eighteenth amendment stands out alone as the only provision of our organic law in restraint of individual freedom.

Therein lies the evil of legislative meddling with moral issues. Its inevitable tendency is to coerce the minority. We have no right to enact our own moral code into the civil law for the government of all.

The best protection for our posterity will be found in the complete severance of personal morals from the domain of legislation. If we fail in this we establish a precedent for our successors to follow when the pendulum of public opinion swings the other way.

Thomas Jefferson, in a letter to Francis W. Gilmer, said:

Our legislators are not sufficiently apprised of the rightful limits of their power; that their office is to declare and enforce only our natural rights and duties, and to take none of them from us. No man has a right to commit an aggression on the equal rights of another, and this is all from which the laws ought to restrain him. (Works of Thomas Jefferson, vol. 7, p. 3.)

PROHIBITION AND MORALS.

The difficulty with prohibition is that it is not a political question; it is not even an economic question, but is fundamentally a moral question, and does not yield to reason.

Morality does not submit to inexorable formulas. It is doomed to lie forever in the shadowy borderland of argument. Its usual solvent is time and place. No fallible human being can say with absolute certainty that a certain course of conduct is ethically right or wrong. All that he knows is that if he agrees with the majority, he may live in peace. If he does not, he is sniffed at or perhaps sent to jail.

It has been said that morality is a relative term, and, when we take a broad view of the human race and consider its divergence of origin and the variety of its ethnic strains, we are bound to admit that there is much truth in that contention. The Turk, sometimes called the unspeakable Turk, deems it highly immoral to take a glass of wine, but considers the polygamous use of women as blessed in the sight of the Almighty. The Turk grafted his morality into the law—even as the antisaloon men have grafted their morality into American law.

THE LAW AND MORALS.

In ancient times, and among primitive peoples, law and religion were one. The law was a part of religion. That was when there was only one religion—the established religion. To-day, there being no established religion, the same forces of intolerance are seeking, indirectly, to engraft the teachings of their religion into the law. There is no difference in principle—the only difference is in the method. Truth is the basic doctrine in all religions and it is well to teach it. It has never, however, in a republic been deemed wise or just to enact the bare doctrine into law. It was soon seen that the legislator would first have to answer the eternal question: "What is truth?" The furthest he could dare go was to make a law punishing any infraction of the moral law which resulted in injury to others. So with temperance. Laws are justly made to punish drunkenness; but it is a novel doctrine in a republic that legislatures may curtail free will and punish an appetite independent of whether or not its exercise has injured the rights of others.

USE OF DRINK AND THE BIBLE.

But is the use of wines and liquors immoral from the Christian standpoint? In this Nation both Jew and Gentile alike take their religion from the Bible. Examining that venerable source of our religion, it will be found in Deuteronomy, chapter 14, verse 26, that the Israelites are told:

And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth: and thou shalt eat there before the Lord thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thine household.

And you will observe that they are told to take their glass of wine or strong drink in the presence of the Lord their God, and not in a cellar or dark corner. Nothing shamefaced about that; but in the open and in the presence of the Lord. And to make the crime worse, they are even told to rejoice, "both they and their household." Think how it must shock the good people who are so deeply concerned for the moral welfare of this Nation when they take up the Bible and find in it such shameless admonitions.

In the second book of Samuel, chapter 16, verse 2, we are told that when King David asked the reason for the gift to him of a bottle of wine Ziba replied:

And the wine, that such as be faint in the wilderness may drink.

To-day a good citizen, if he were faint in the wilderness, would, of course, dash the bottle of wine upon a rock and refresh himself with a long lingering whiff of smelling salts!

But, of course, there is a possibility that our pious friends may reject the testimony of the Old Testament as being the guide of a pagan people in rough and uncouth times, when the chemist's art had not progressed to that supercivilized state where spirits of ammonia and synthetic substitutes for wines and other refreshments were procurable.

What, however, have they to say to the miracle performed by the Founder of the Christian religion, as told in John, chapter 2, verses 1 to 11? At that time there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee and Jesus was invited. And the wine failing, he turned six water pots of water into wine. And such good wine it was that the chief steward remarked to the bridegroom:

Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse: but thou hast kept the good wine until now.

Imagine Christ coming back to earth and attempting such a feat as that to-day. He would be apprehended by an enforcement officer, thrown into prison, tried for manufacturing an alcoholic beverage in defiance of law, and the wine thus miraculously made would be indignantly and ruthlessly thrown into the sewer.

Where, then, is the religious sanction or authority for this movement against stimulating beverages? It has no sanction in the Bible, and the only religion in harmony with the prohibition movement is, as I said before, the religion of the Turks—the religion of Islam. Is it not rather anomalous, to say the least, that the viewpoint of the founder of Christianity should be rejected in favor of that of Mohammed?

Truly, it reminds us of the words of Abraham, quoted in Luke, chapter 16, verse 31:

If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead

RELIGIOUS ASPECT OF PROHIBITION.

And yet, strange to say, this prohibition movement has a religious environment and stimulus. Bishop James Cannon, jr., in advocating this bill before the Judiciary Committee, said, on page 24 of the hearings, that although a member of it he did not appear in the name of the Anti-Saloon League, but "as representing the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the third largest Protestant denomination in this country."

William B. Anderson stated before the same committee on the same occasion (p. 26) that he spoke for upward of 4,000 churches in the State of New York that are supporting the Anti-Saloon League.

Mr. R. L. Davis, superintendent of the North Carolina Anti-Saloon League, appeared also as the secretary of the Board of Temperance and Social Service of the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South (p. 36).

Mr. Charles Scanlon appeared as the secretary of the Board of Temperance of the Presbyterian Church in the United States.

Mr. Deets Pickett appeared as the representative of the Board of Temperance Prohibition and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church (p. 191).

Mr. S. E. Nicholson appeared as chairman of the Board of Prohibition of the Friends or Quakers (p. 311).

A perusal of the testimony of some of these gentlemen before the Judiciary Committee, which reports this bill, is interesting and illuminating, showing, as it will, the tendency to microscopic concentration and utter lack of broad humanity which animates the sponsors of the prohibition movement.

For instance, Mr. R. L. Davis gloats over the fact that in his State—North Carolina—they have ceased "weaning them off" gradually, but have gone after violations of the law in a different manner, namely:

There has been destroyed by officers, or killed by officers in the enforcement of the law, four blockaders and one faithful man, a policeman.

In other words, five killed in one raid. He admits that there are at least 115 illicit distilleries in his State (p. 38). If raids on all of these are to be accomplished with the same loss of life there will be a casualty list of 575—a pretty sacrifice, indeed, to enforce an absurd law. With this gentle crusader obviously "it is easier for heaven and earth to pass than one tittle of the law to fail."

Mr. Deets Pickett thinks the foreign element in our population are going to "recast their ideas" on the enforcement question (p. 192).

Mr. Samuel Wilson, assistant superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New Jersey, says (p. 292):

New Jersey, being a common-law State, we do not have to bother with juries, and the judges are sending them to jail, and we feel very much encouraged.

What a sweet disposition this good man must have to be so delighted and encouraged by the sending of his fellow men to jail!

Mr. S. E. Nicholson, of the good Quakers, in arguing to bring the Philippines under the baleful and petrifying influence of prohibition, says (p. 318) that because there is sentiment against the prohibition amendment he is sure that that trifling circumstance ought not to interfere with the imposition of the law upon them.

Mr. Charles Scanlon asked, "in the name of" the Presbyterian denomination, "that we have sufficient guaranty that the law is obeyed and whatever inconvenience or expense that may be suffered be endured" (p. 85).

From this we derive the clear and definite conclusion that with the religious zealot engaged in a reform crusade nothing counts but the end to be achieved. In other words, the end justifies the means. No matter about the expense or personal loss to the victims; no matter about the loss of lives, they die in a good cause, so they think. No matter about the Constitution—the preservation of trial by jury, and other little things like that for which our forefathers died. No matter about the ethnic origin of others—all must bend, all must give way before the onslaught of one perfervid, all-absorbing idea, namely, the forcing of conformity of opinion upon the human race.

THE SALOON AND THE CHURCH.

It must be conceded that in the beginning the basic impulse was laudable. Good men saw the evil influence of the saloon growing throughout the land threatening American ideals. They directed their attack at first at that evil, and many persons of liberal views and temperate habits joined heartily with them. Manufacturers and large employers of labor, familiar with the factor of drunkenness as a drawback to efficiency, willingly lent their cooperation. But in its inception nowhere was there visible the slightest intent to attack anything but the abuse of drink by controlling its use.

Avenues of financial support soon opened up leading to the coffers of great interests, and, with vast wealth at their disposal, the paid publicity men, whose interest it was to keep up the agitation, enlarged the original temperance movement into a prohibition campaign, giving it at last the aspect of a religious crusade. They were enabled to gain headway by the arrogance and shortsightedness of the brewing and liquor interests, who, by their own folly, drove their adversaries into an impregnable position. If the liquor interests had consented to the elimination of the saloon in the beginning, they would not have had to suffer ultimately the utter destruction of their industry and brought down on the American people a form of sumptuary legislation which is offensive to every principle of free government. The saloon, as a political factor, was indefensible; but, if the saloon in the past became a factor in politics, its purpose was so transparent as to invite its own destruction. The growth of the church influence in politics is even more to be deplored because its methods are insidious. It has no concern for fundamental principles of liberty.

I am not decrying religion or religious crusaders. As individuals they are willing to admit the fallibility of human judgment, but in the mass they are usually intolerant of minorities. As individuals they are kindly, gentle, and humane. But in the mass, when aroused by what they think is moral righteousness, they are prone to usurp the wrath of the Almighty.

ARE WE DRIFTING BACK INTO THEOCRACY?

Civil lawyers have invented a phrase to justify the State's invasion of individual liberty. They call it "the police power of the State." Under this the State officers invade your home and tell you what kind of plumbing you ought to use or how your walls should be papered. Churchmen have invented a similar slogan, "The moral power of the State," and under it they purpose to invade your home and tell you what you shall drink at your table.

In the colonial history of this country it will be found that our good ancestors thought that in the exercise of the moral power of the State they had the right to compel the individual to go to church on the Sabbath. In Virginia the statute provided that the third offense in failing to attend divine service on the Sabbath should be punishable by death. In Massachusetts and in Connecticut "presumptuous Sunday desecration," or breaking the Sabbath, was also punishable by death. Even in tolerant Maryland, which led the way in the New World to toleration of all Christian creeds, blasphemy was punishable by "death without benefit of clergy." In all of the Thirteen Colonies lashes and public exposure in the stocks were the fate of those who offended against the statutes which religion had injected into the legislation of the Commonwealths.

It is to the everlasting credit of Roger Williams that he rebelled against the exercise of such restraint upon the individual conscience. For his manly stand in defense of human liberty he was driven out of the colony of Massachusetts in the dead of winter and compelled to throw himself on the mercy of the savage but sympathetic red men of the wilderness. With a few followers, in 1636, he founded the colony of Rhode Island, at Providence Plantations, where he dedicated, as the foundation stone of the new government, the lofty, imperishable principle "that conscience was by nature free, and that it was the duty of human society to preserve intact that freedom whereof the least violation was invariably the first step to soul bondage."

This would seem to be only the enunciation of a self-evident proposition; yet old errors die so slowly that it took over two centuries of growth of American public opinion to eradicate from our State laws those medieval statutes which enchained the human conscience.

To-day we are witnessing a renewal of that old spirit of interference with individual conscience, and the inquiry is truly pertinent: "Are we drifting back into theocracy?"

The eighteenth amendment is a violation of the right of individual freedom of opinion. It brings discredit on our glorious Constitution, which up to this hour has been held holy as the sacred repository of human liberty. The sooner this amendment is repealed the better will it be for America and humanity.

MAJORITIES NOT ALWAYS RIGHT.

It is said that prohibition was passed by a large majority and approved by 45 of the States. True, but in violation of the fundamental principles of free government. A majority does not make it right. There is no sanctity about majorities. Majorities sustained the Suttee of India; sustained human slavery; sustained the crucifixion of the founder of Christianity upon the cross 2,000 years ago; sustained the inquisition in Spain; sustained the law of primogeniture in England, and has upheld dueling and scores of customs which a kindlier and more enlightened age has completely rejected and abandoned as barbarous and unjust.

It is no new thought to say that majorities can not make things right which are fundamentally wrong nor make things wrong which are fundamentally right. The whole issue lies in the free arena of controversy. Whatever our own individual opinion may be, we have not the right to embed that opinion in our Constitution and then make laws putting those who think differently in the class of potential offenders, by making certain acts criminal which, wherever free men live, in all the history of the world have been recognized as perfectly lawful. [Applause.]

Mr. CLASSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I am conscious that nothing can be said on this subject in five minutes which would impress the Members of this House. It is a very big subject. My own belief is that it may turn out that the best way to secure a repeal of any law is to enforce it. This is a hard law to enforce. Its difficulty now lies in the fact that was indicated to me by a plain inspector of customs on the dock in New York who said, "I do not know what we are going to do in this country about the obligation of an oath, because people who come into this country seem to think it is perfectly right to swear falsely about having liquor in their possession who would not swear falsely about other matters, and as a result the whole customs law is upset." In Maine in the old days, when they had had 40 years of prohibition, I saw whisky sold over the soda-water counter in Portland, Me., in soda-water glasses. They have had prohibition in Georgia for some 10 or 15 years, and a member of a college society who went through that State on the way to Cuba spoke of their celebration there in a city where the chief of police was present, and yet there were wines flowing and the chief himself was so intoxicated that he gave his cap to one of the attendants of those boys who took it down to Cuba.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I can not yield to the gentleman, I have only five minutes.

I want to help make a law that can and will be enforced. Now, I will say, first, I believe that it was whisky and spirits that caused the ruin that brought on this law. [Applause.] I do not believe that beer and light wines create drunkenness. Hogarth pictured Beer Street and Gin Lane. I know when I went forth to camp with about 40 boys liquors were prohibited and after two and a half hours in the morning of violent drill and two and a half more in the afternoon the thirst was consuming. The water there was bad and gave dysentery; as a result many of the fellows drank whisky and about one-third of them, temperate men, too, during that week were somewhat overcome by drink. At the next camp we were presented with a thousand bottles of beer, which met the thirst, and nobody was affected during the whole time, though that beer was on free tap for ourselves and our friends.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Only one more sentence. This bill attacks and prohibits the prescription of mild beverages that can be found and regulated by law and gives preference to whisky and strong wines of 24 per cent which can be secreted. This is a mistake. It is a law not easily enforced and this tends to make men break the law. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was struck by the high type of men and women who appeared before the Committee on the Judiciary and advocated the passage of this measure. There came before this committee Bishop Cannon, of the Methodist Church, the third largest organization of its kind in America, and there came also, among other excellent people, Wayne B. Wheeler, Dr. Wiley, William B. Anderson, Mrs. Boole, and a particularly fine motherly woman from the good State of Kentucky, Mrs. Beecham, a kinswoman, I assume, of our lamented Speaker, Champ Clark. Right living, high thinking, and purity of conduct had written on the face of that splendid woman lines of classical beauty. It is not a bad thing to reflect that the supporters of this measure are traveling along the same highway with this goodly company. Many mothers appeared before our committee asking us to pass this bill. No mother, no woman, no minister spoke against it. The only woman Member of this House is supporting the bill. My eloquent and agreeable and Irish friend from Boston, Mr. GALLIVAN, is always interesting and eloquent, as always are the Irish. He is happy in his diction, always eloquent, always wet, and always wrong upon the liquor question. And he is to be followed this afternoon, I understand, by one of the most remarkable orators this House has ever heard. I had not had the pleasure of listening to our friend from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] until this session. He is not only a graceful orator, but he is a fluent and interesting talker as well. He is to close the debate in opposition to this bill.

I love the Irish. I am half Irish myself and have the right to talk about them. God bless them. They have fought gallantly for every country but their own, and I rejoice to see them loyal to the old country and loyal to the shamrock.

> There's a little green plant that grows over the sea,
> And the emerald leaves that it numbers are three,
> And the heart of the Irishman ever is true
> To the little green shamrock all covered with dew.

Gentle Irishmen, I want to see you loyal to the shamrock, loyal to Irish traditions, loyal to Irish whisky, even, but I do not like to see you get down on your proud knees and beg quarter for that broth of hell known as German lager beer. [Applause.] On this great liquor issue I appeal from my eloquent friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], whom I love very much, to another Massachusetts man, John B. Gough, a rugged, fiery dramatic orator, who spoke against the giant evil of drink from ocean to ocean. And we all admire our genial, splendid friend from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], who is in charge of the opposition to this bill, but I appeal from him, much as we respect him, to that splendid woman, another Illinoisan, Frances Willard, whose marble statue stands out yonder—Frances Willard, whose fire-touched lips preached temperance throughout America. Her very name suggests white ribbon purity.

I regret that my handsome young friend from New York took occasion to say some things that I think he should have left unsaid, when he told the House that the place to get liquor in New York was at the police stations, and among officers who are sworn to enforce prohibition. Now, is this really true? It is a bad habit we have to decry judges, law-enforcement officers, to decry men who are church members or who stand for law enforcement. I believe this law can be enforced. It comes in bad grace from those who are against the passage of this bill to attempt to cast criticism and insinuations against those who happen to favor it.

Some of these critics are unfair and have no respect for things sacred.

Let me tell you what one witness at the hearings said was being done. He testified that they were selling in New York City a bottle with a holy cross upon it, marked holy water, and that the sacred symbol "I. H. S." was on the bottle. The majority of officers want to enforce the law, the majority of men and women in America believe in enforcing law. We have heard much said about the lack of law enforcement.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will.

Mr. MILLS. Does the gentleman apply his remarks with equal force to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. TILLMAN. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution is enforced, at least in the State of Arkansas. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. And in Texas.

Mr. TILLMAN. And in Texas. In Arkansas, I assume you mean to say, we disfranchise the Negro. We have a poll-tax requirement in my State, the payment of which is made a prerequisite to voting, and this applies with equal force to whites and blacks. But I will not be diverted from discussing the eighteenth amendment because the gentleman from New York prefers to talk about the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. MILLS. How does the gentleman distinguish the various laws which do disfranchise the Negro from fake doctors' prescriptions?

Mr. TILLMAN. One reason why the South is for prohibition is because fake doctors have prescribed gin and beer and certain patent medicines for the Negroes, and these Negroes, inflamed by these liquors, sometimes commit the awful crime of rape, for which they are sometimes hanged in the South, a fact that we all deplore.

Other States besides my own require a poll tax, an educational qualification, or registration as a prerequisite to voting.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Let me say that the gentleman is incorrect in regard to the Massachusetts law.

Mr. TILLMAN. You have not any poll tax?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. No. The law does not deprive any man of the right to vote.

Mr. TILLMAN. You have no property qualification there? At any rate, you have an educational qualification?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. We have no property qualification and never had one.

Mr. COCKRAN. And let me make the same statement as to New York. There is no property qualification, poll tax, or anything else that prescribes conditions in New York State.

Mr. CARTER. You have registration, have you not?

Mr. COCKRAN. Registration is universal.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, our requirement as to a poll tax is tantamount to registration. It is simply the payment of $1 to the common-school fund.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. In Massachusetts they have an educational test.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why, certainly they have an educational test there. It is far more drastic and less fair than the law requiring the payment of a dollar to the school tax, as entitling one to the privilege of voting.

Mr. COCKRAN. We have none in New York.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I must decline to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do not tell me that this law can not be enforced. You might say the law against murder is not enforced. It is, and yet men who are charged with murder are often acquitted, and men charged with the violation of this law are likewise often acquitted. But I say it is an insult to both State and Federal judiciary to say that this law will not be enforced. As long as we respect the judiciary as we do now, this country is safe.

I was much pleased with the action of the electorate in the good city of Chicago not long since. There is a political boss in the city of Chicago named Thompson, who is at the head of one of the numerous municipal political machines in the country, and he could always elect his candidates for Representatives and for county clerk and for sheriff, but when it came to electing his judicial ticket in the city of Chicago, the best people, Democrats and Republicans alike, got together and elected the splendid bench that they have had for years, mostly Republicans, and defeated the Thompson ticket. It shows the people respect the judiciary and can be relied on to select the best men for judicial positions, and these men will see to it that all laws are respected and enforced.

This measure is simply to stop the sale of beer as a medicine. It is not now and it never has been a medicine in the United States; never has been listed as a medicine in the United States Pharmacopœia.

Mr. VOLK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I can not yield now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. Dr. Wiley is an eminent physician, and he has plenty of money, is not a candidate for office, and he says beer never has been and is not now a medicine, and has never been prescribed as a medicine. It is true that the hops in the beer are a sort of tonic, and the malt is a sort of food, but the alcoholic content is not a medicine. Physician after physician and druggists all over the land testified before our committee and filed their statements to the effect that beer is not a medicine.

The best doctors are not giving much medicine any more. They say go out and breathe the free air of heaven for your diseases; go out and get the sunshine, eat proper food, and you will become cured.

Oh, they say, you must not limit physicians in the things they want to prescribe. They say if doctors want to prescribe beer, let them do so. Well, physicians are not supermen. They do not know everything. Any sensible man knows that beer and alcohol and intoxicating liquor do a thousand times more harm than good, and even though occasionally a prescription of beer would be helpful, the doctors must simply forego prescribing it for the greater good beer prohibition will bring about.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. I regret that I can not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, take the proud city of New York. I want to see a dry New York. I want to take your liquor from you. I want you to be the greatest city in the world, and you would be if——

Mr. COCKRAN. We are——

Mr. TILLMAN. If you were dry. You would be still greater if they took your beer and certain other things away from you. Poor old London, the biggest city in the world, is now trembling from center to circumference. Why? Because the red radicals have her by the throat. Where do those radicals meet and plot? At the saloons. Sturdy old England, great as she is, is being debauched by half-and-half, by beer and ale and liquor, and because of this she will not be able to keep pace with sober America in the great race for world supremacy. [Applause.]

I want to see a dry world. I am no better than the average man. I have learned my lessons about the world, not in the correspondence school but by experience. I am not a crank, but I tell you I believe in prohibition and I believe the world is going to be saved by it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I ask unanimous consent that all those who speak on this bill may revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all Members who speak on this bill may revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I assume that privilege will extend only to their own remarks?

The SPEAKER. With that limitation, is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the decision of Attorney General Palmer that beer might be prescribed by physicians as a medicine under the Volstead Act created consternation throughout the country among those who believed, when the Volstead Act was enacted, that it prohibited the use of beer for medicinal purposes as well as for beverage purposes. Since then the one purpose of those who are in favor of the enforcement of the law under the eighteenth amendment throughout the country is to secure such an amendment to the law as will enable those in charge of its enforcement to enforce it against beer as well as the other prohibitive provisions of the law.

The Judiciary Committee very properly took up this subject and considered the question of passing a law that would prevent those in charge of the preparation of regulations and the enforcement of the law from putting into effect at a very early date regulations permitting physicians to prescribe beer and thus opening up breweries throughout the country for the manufacture of beer. Those interested in many breweries resorted to every possible trick to delay the passage of a law to prevent regulations being put in force for the sale of medicinal beer. The Treasury Department had been threatening for days to promulgate those regulations. The danger was imminent that they would be promulgated. The necessity was great that they should not be promulgated. The necessity was great that Congress should pass a law prohibiting the prescribing of beer as a medicine. But the Judiciary Committee entangled and entwined with the beer provision many other controversial questions that would have delayed the passage of the antibeer provision indefinitely, if indeed it ever could have been passed, loaded down with such riders as the Judiciary Committee loaded it with. The bill came to the Committee on Rules for a rule. They did not ask for its consideration under a suspension of the rules last Monday, as they might have done if they had had a bill for which there was a general demand and to which there was no serious objection. But, no; they asked for a rule.

The Committee on Rules, after a hearing to discover whether there was an emergency—not for the passage of the beer bill, because there was no question about that—found that it was proposed in the bill to give control of industrial alcohol used in the arts and sciences and in manufactures, over which Congress has no power under the eighteenth amendment, to the prohibition enforcement officer to find out about the question and provisions about which there was controversy. Well, the Rules Committee listened to those who came before them, and it was very apparent that the committee did not take kindly to the other provisions in the bill. I think the Committee on Rules in its personnel compares very favorably with other committees in this House. It embraces such men as SNELL and FESS and RODENBERG and DALE and JOHNSON and SCHALL and POU and GARRETT and CANTRILL and RIORDAN—a splendid array of men of high purpose and high character. They were in favor of passing at once a law that would cover beer, and make a provision against it which they had supposed was in the Volstead law when it was originally passed.

I have no apologies whatever to make to the Judiciary Committee or to any member of it for introducing a bill that I believe will speedily pass and become a law and prevent the breweries of this country from starting again at an early date. [Applause.] That was the purpose that I had, and that was the purpose that other members of the Committee on Rules had, and that is the purpose I have now in urging the speedy passage of this bill, so that it can meet another bill of similar import in the Senate and receive the early approval of the Congress and the President and become a law. [Applause.]

This is not the first time that the Committee on Rules has been criticized. We are not above mistakes, either its personnel or as a committee, neither are the Members of this House or other committees of this House. I recall another time that a feeling arose between the individual members of the Judiciary Committee and the Rules Committee. It was something like two years ago when the Committee on Rules prevented a bill reenacting the old alien and sedition laws coming up on this floor at a time when there was feverish excitement in the country against every man of alien birth. We prevented the bill coming on the floor after it had passed the Senate and been favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee of the House. Is there a man in Congress to-day who will introduce that bill and ask for its passage after there has been this opportunity for cooling off?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, there is one, and that makes it absolutely certain that nobody else would be in favor of it. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Speaker, this bill should be passed at the earliest moment possible. Indeed, there was never any necessity for more than 40 minutes' debate on it. Whether those who are in favor of beer and light wines as a beverage like it or not, the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution does not provide for light beers and wines in the United States. The sooner the people of this country realize the fact that prohibition of spirits and vinous and malt liquors is here to stay and that proper laws are enacted for the enforcement of that constitutional provision the better it will be for them and the whole country. [Applause.]

Mr. CLASSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VOLK].

Mr. VOLK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I can not work myself into a furore over this beer bill, and whether it passes or not makes very little material difference to me. However, I should like to correct a few of the remarks that were made on the floor here to-day, and, as my authority, I would like to say that in 1906 I began the practice of medicine and have been practicing on and off since that time. In 1914 I began the practice of law and I was a legislator in 1913. I can discuss this problem from nearly every angle. In 1913, before the prohibition law was ever heard of, Potter's Materia Medica, at page 111, contained this on alcohol:

The use of alcoholic beverages in moderate quantity for healthy persons is violently condemned by extreme total-abstinence advocates, who make use of garbled quotations from medical authorities to support their arguments. Physicians generally agree with Mr. Lawson Tait, who declared himself "fully persuaded, after 30 years of life, as hard in work and as full of responsibility as well could be, that the moderate use of alcohol is a necessity in our modern life."

Dr. Robert Farquharson sums up the case for moderate drinking as follows: "All stimulant is unnecessary for the young and for people living perfectly healthy lives. But, under the stress and struggle of modern civilization, few of us beyond middle age are placed under normal physiological conditions, and a little alcohol helps us to round the corners, and to plane away the asperities of existence. In turns it may be a stimulant, or a sedative, or a tonic, or a digestive, or an actual food; and unless we run on into excess, no physical damage can possibly be done to our tissues The argument in its favor, when wisely and prudently used, seems complete. It does us good and can do us no harm."

Now, ordinary kumiss contains from 2 to 3 per cent of alcohol; that is a milk preparation and you drink it freely every day. The ordinary fermented milk contains some alcohol, more than beer, and you do not go into a furor over a milk preparation. Why be afraid of beer? It is too bulky to be used in bootlegging. You need not be afraid of the bootleggers dealing in beer for they can not carry a case and get away with it. [Laughter and applause.]

We are facing a crisis with regard to the eighteenth amendment and the prohibition enforcement act. There has been an increase of drunkenness, criminality, and insanity, and many are turning to narcotic drugs for relief. Disrespect for the law is common, and otherwise self-respecting citizens violate the prohibition law as gleefully as a child on mischief bent.

Law is the crystallized moral sentiment of the community. A law which has not the moral support of the people can not be enforced. The only result of the prohibition law, so called, has been to remove from the Government about one-half billion dollars of yearly revenue. It has raised the price of liquor to an exorbitant degree and has resulted in flooding the market with "bootleg" whisky, high priced, dangerous, and of questionable quality. In addition to the loss in revenue it has become necessary to appropriate millions of dollars yearly for the enforcement of the law and in this expense the States have been compelled to join.

Has the supply of alcoholic beverages diminished? Light wines and beers have practically disappeared. The consumer must get his drink in concentrated form and chooses strong spirits. The rich and well to do can gratify their taste, but the poor man is left nothing but his thirst and his resentment against class discrimination. No one has any desire to defend the saloon nor intemperance nor the many evils of the liquor traffic, but reforms in morals and habits of people can not come by legislation. It is a process of gradual evolution.

The report of the committee shows that—

On January 1, 1921, there were in the bonded warehouses in the United States 40,216,079 gallons of whisky. At the end of March, 1921, there were 40,325,257 gallons of whisky, or 109,000 gallons more than on January 1.

Can it be that even under regulation by law we are producing more whisky than is necessary for consumption? Or, is it not more reasonable to assume that bootlegging has increased and that legitimate stocks in Government bonded warehouses are not the main source of supply?

To say that beer is not a medicine is to upset the experience and learning of the medical profession. Though 104 so-called physicians and scientists sign a statement "that the manufacture and sale of beer and other malt liquors for medicinal purposes should not be permitted," and so forth, how insignificant they seem compared with the 150,000 physicians in the United States to-day. The American Medical Editors' Association, composed of editors of the various medical magazines of the country, discussed this question at their fifty-second annual meeting held on June 7. A resolution was passed protesting against further undue regulation of therapeutic procedure by statutes or by administrative interpretation or regulation, and requested a review and revision of such existing statutes or rules or regulations restrictive of the therapeutic judgment and procedure of physicians. This was considered necessary for the preservation of the necessary rights of the medical profession and in the name of public welfare and wise public policy. The law should be a sane one and capable of proper enforcement.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, as the representative of a constituency that is overwhelmingly opposed and antagonistic to this measure, I shall vote against it. Like all of the other Members who will vote in the negative on the passage of the bill, I thoroughly understand the attitude of this House with reference to the Volstead Act. The proponents of that legislation are more numerous, if anything, than they were in the Sixty-sixth Congress, and as a matter of arithmetical deduction the opponents are less in number than they were in the last Congress.

Notwithstanding the apparent growth of the prohibition sentiment as evidenced by its increase in legislative strength, it is clear to the most superficial student of social and governmental affairs that "things are not what they seem." Some remarkable phases of the prohibition situation were evidenced on the floor of the House to-day. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] in closing a very pointed though brief address on the subject matter under consideration remarked, "And I drink less in a year than many of the Members who will vote for this measure drink in a week." No one challenged the verity of that statement or expression. No one was apparently astonished. No mind in the House of Representatives was illumined by the suggestion that the lawmaking body itself treated prohibition and the statute lightly and flippantly and as a rule of action that was expected or supposed to be more honored in the breach than in the observance.

Under ordinary circumstances a suggestion that a proposed act might outrun and contravene the Constitution would arouse the serious thought of a great many of the Members of what is concededly a thoughtful assembly of representatives of the people, notwithstanding the criticism that is leveled at it from time to time. But in this case the declaration of many speakers to the effect that the proposed bill violated the constitutional rights of citizens provoked derisive smiles, which meant as plainly as words might have conveyed the facetious jocularity that has stood the test of so many years, "What is the Constitution between friends?" As a matter of fact, it is clear to the ordinary observer of men and matters that it is not difficult, where one has the price, to quickly escape from the burning sands of the desert and find nepenthe in many an oasis in every city, great and small, in the country.

Some time since I read in the New York Times that Mr. Don. V. Parker, prohibition officer of Ohio, had given out a rather startling view of the situation in that State. Two years ago not more than a hundred stills were in operation, according to the commissioner. Now, the Columbus correspondent of the Cleveland Plain Dealer informs us that Mr. Parker is willing to concede that an estimate of 50,000 active stills in the State is conservative. Just as melancholy is the census of the children of "malt and hops." Prior to prohibition there were perhaps a few more than 200 breweries in Ohio. Now it is said that the number runs into hundreds of thousands. Fortunately, "it is said" suggests a wide region of guess and surmise. The Columbus police, men of wet bias, evidently estimate that one family out of every four brews its own beer. Many women are making beer for themselves, their families, and friends. Females' hands are also busy in producing wine and whisky. Apricots, raisins, and so on, for forbidden purposes, have an enormous sale at the groceries. Officials of the prohibition department admit that in some communities nearly 100 per cent of the homes are engaged in the illicit production of either distilled or fermented liquor. Wet statisticians, airily playing with the estimate that one family out of every four is a brewery, are happy in the conviction that Ohio, with a population of 5,800,000, is running 290,000 breweries.

One tale is good till another is told, yet if the prohibition commissioner of Ohio grants "that an estimate of 50,000 active stills in the State is conservative," the Buckeye heathen are much more numerous than anybody would have expected. Why should Ohio be, if it be, so much more wicked than New York or any other State?

If the figures mentioned by the Times are anyway near accurate and the people in the other States of the Union are disposed to view life from the same good-humored standpoint as the citizens of the Buckeye State, then it follows that there are approximately 5,500,000 breweries running and nearly 1,000,000 stills operating in the United States.

No wonder that the average man in public life of our country laughs uproariously at the suggestion that the constitutional rights of citizens are imperiled by reasons of a pretended or an imaginary compliance with the article and the statute. Apparently no one seems to believe it is reprehensible to violate this law. Instead of the solemn declaration of many Congressmen who addressed the House to the effect that this bill was based on the theory that an amazingly large number of members of the medical profession were lawbreakers, or could be easily tempted to violate the law, calling or provoking any denial or defending answer from the proponents, there seemed to be a desire upon the part of many to laugh at the matter, and as some Members said in private conversation, enjoy the legislative cudgeling of the disciples of Aesculapius, probably on the theory that each phase and strata of society sooner or later fall a victim to public criticism, and as lawyers and legislators have "gotten theirs" for many a day it is time for "the healers" to get the lambasting which this bill undoubtedly attempts to give them.

Some time since one of the great jurisconsults of this country said in discussing prohibition enforcement and the interpretation of the eighteenth amendment that—

The Volstead Act in its present form is a piece of glaring legislative chicanery and lawlessness that is without precedent and without even the merit of a decent excuse. It is an incitement to contempt for law, and on that ground, and not primarily because it prohibits non-intoxicating beer, its modification becomes imperative to those who are wedded to the rule of law and order.

Permit me to particularize. The eighteenth amendment prohibits "the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor as a beverage," and gives to Congress and the States concurrent power to enact the necessary legislation to carry this prohibition into effect. The Supreme Court has said in effect that when the people gave to Congress and the States concurrent power they meant to give Congress sole and supreme power to the exclusion of the States. The court further decided in effect that the character and extent of the legislation that Congress may enact is without constitutional limitation or right of view; that the people left that entire subject unreservedly to Congress and that the courts have no control over it; if Congress has deceived the people and abused its power, its Members are accountable to their constituents and not to the courts.

What, then, has Congress done under this unlimited grant of power "to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage"? It has legislated to forbid the manufacture and sale of beverages which contain only one-half of 1 per cent of alcoholic content—beverages that it does not pretend, and that nobody has ever pretended, to be intoxicating, or that could possibly tend to intoxicate, as was frankly admitted by the members of the Senate committee upon the argument of the bill. It is not, therefore, because of anything that has been done with respect to "rum or no rum," nor because there is any controversy over the wisdom of the amendment, which is a great blessing to the country, but because Congress has grossly abused its power, that its action is to be challenged at the bar of popular judgment. The absurdity and bad faith of the limitation are made apparent when we consider that the alcoholic contents fixed by the law are less than are contained in a beefsteak. A glance at the proceedings before the committee when the bill was before it will convince any fair-minded person that Congress, under the whip of the Anti-Saloon League, lawlessly arrogated to itself the arbitrary power to outlaw non-alcoholic beverages, and that by that act of usurpation it has plunged this entire subject into the political arena as a bone for endless controversy.

Will anybody seriously contend that three-quarters of the States of the Union would have ratified the eighteenth amendment if they had suspected that it would ever have been held to include beverages which the promoters of the amendment have time and again themselves admitted to be beyond question nonintoxicating?

It is the most vicious form of class legislation and is bound to breed resentment and class hatred, besides which the law is unenforceable in the great cities, where it is most needed, and is only being sporadically enforced, and is generally openly violated.

The ruthless confiscation of property resulting from this abuse of power runs into billions of dollars. The business of brewing beer, a wholesome, harmless industry that has since the foundation of our Government been recognized as respectable and encouraged by legislation and that has yielded a substantial part of the State and Federal revenues, is thus summarily annihilated, without compensation to the owners, contrary to what is believed to be the will of the people.

If the Volstead Act is a legitimate exercise of the power intended to be delegated to Congress and not an abuse of that power, the form of the amendment prohibiting only intoxicating liquors was a fraud upon the people. Their remedy is to elect a Congress that will conform the law to the Constitution, which the Supreme Court has said is within the power of Congress to do.

Mr. Speaker, I would not measure the happiness of the human race or the welfare of my countrymen by money. I would not add to the misery of the race by a single jot for all of the wealth that has been piled up and then dissipated during all of the ages that have rolled their way into eternity. If I can not make some nook of God's creation a little brighter for my presence in this world, I will never attempt consciously to make it darker.

As long as God Almighty gives me the light to see the right I will champion the right. By no act of mine will ever I diminish the chances of any human being on this earth from securing the contentment and pleasure that ought to be found in human existence.

I believe that end can be secured by looking at life sanely and from a common-sense standpoint. I can not subscribe to the theory that a fanatical reformer, who at times mistakes his own malevolence for a supreme virtue, is any better citizen or friend of the human race than the one who seeks by advocating temperance in all things and the building up of character to promote the welfare of his generation and those that are to follow. Far better, in my judgment, would it have been had the use of strong drink been prohibited and the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer allowed under strict regulation and a proper license tax. The subject should have been approached by way of an incline gradually reaching the summit or goal desired than through the precipitous leap that was undertaken and which failed to reach destination. Better to have a few hundred well-regulated breweries and wineries producing a desirable liquid food, according to excellent medical authority and upon which a noted political economist recently declared before a congressional committee could be levied a tax that would yield to the Government approximately $1,000,000,000 annually, than to have millions of kitchens fitted up with mechanical apparatus and the ingredients to produce either wine or beer. Regulation, in my judgment, would be productive of better results than ever can flow from prohibition.

The well-regulated restaurant where light wines and beer might be had would at once become a citadel and fortress of temperance, and drunkenness would become a thing of the past, as a proprietor would not care to run the risk, under a proper regulation, of losing his license and his status as a good citizen under the well-crystallized public opinion resulting from such a governmental system. Deplorable as it might be, however humiliating to thoughtful citizens who are not facetiously inclined, the fact stands out glaringly and shamelessly that prohibition has resulted in producing a lawlessness in our cities and, according to the best accounts, in the rural communities that may ultimately become a menace to that law and order which we know has been the bulwark of our national existence. The liquor traffic to-day, being outlawed, is lawlessly carried on by some of the most desperate members of every community, who are gradually but surely undermining and sapping the respectability and manhood of those citizens who are foolish enough to surreptitiously deal with these illegal agents of an outlawed and lawless traffic. It is needless to point out the danger that must spring from such an attitude toward the national enforcement act. It is an easy step from one violation to another. The imagination of each citizen in all probability can body forth what may follow such an easy attitude toward the violation of law and order more vividly than I can hope to produce for him by any picture that I might attempt to draw of what seems to lie beyond a drastic enforcement of an act that millions will violate contemptuously and derisively.

Mr. Speaker, my theme is ended. I hope that I have conservatively and faithfully expressed the viewpoint of the people among whom I was born and reared—a brave, proud, and valiant people who will obey the law as it is written and interpreted, but who believe that they have a right by petition and through their Representative to attempt to secure a modification of what they believe is a statute that far outruns the constitutional purpose of the eighteenth amendment.

I am glad to present and express the views of an overwhelming majority of the constituency that I have the honor to represent—glad because, and I can not repeat it too often, I believe well-regulated restaurants wherein might be served light wines and beer possessing nutrious food value would serve a better purpose than prohibition and the hypocrisies, deceits, chicaneries, and vicious lawlessness that are apparently inseparably associated presently with the futile attempt to enforce the statutory provision and regulations of what is known as the Volstead Act. I concede to others what I hope may be granted to myself, the sincerity of my protestations and belief. No man possesses the infallible touchstone of truth. Men equally honest and sincere will differ upon the best mode to secure the welfare of the Nation and the happiness of the people. I believe the modification of the Volstead Act by the Congress of the United States substituting regulation for prohibition as the motif of the Nation's attitude is necessary in order to procure the best results obtainable in a society as complex as that which constitutes the United States of America. From now on I think the pendulum will swing in the direction of moderation, temperance, and common sense, and that within the course of a few years Members of Congress in both branches will reflect the reconsidered judgment of the American people by the modification which I have suggested in this feeble attempt to express the attitude of the people of the first congressional district of Louisiana.

Mr. CLASSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOGAN].

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is an attempt to give added strictness to a law which has already exceeded the limit of enforcement. The facts set forth in the report of the Judiciary Committee—that on January 1, 1921, there were in the bonded warehouses of the United States 40,216,079 gallons of whisky, that at the end of March this total had been increased by 109,000 gallons, and that the Government collected more than $138,000,000 in revenue from liquor during the past year—are sufficient proof that the Volstead Act, born of a fanatic zeal to invade the private right of the individual, is not taken with sufficient seriousness by a people which has always been resentful of even a semblance of any tyranny on the part of the majority.

It will not be denied that expedients for the manufacture of home brew are growing in such vast numbers as to stimulate the curiosity if not the envy of those who do not know how to use them. In the face of more or less pious and hopeful statements that prohibition is here, bootlegging is the only business which has failed to suffer from the industrial depression, which is the natural consequence of a Democratic administration. While the author of the act designed to take much of the joy out of life disdains to recognize that his creation possibly could be a failure we have constant evidence all around us that the wealthy have liquid refreshment of good quality when they desire it and those less fortunate suffer from impurities which they imbibe with considerable freedom, though not so openly.

I have no doubt that if all the people should refrain from taking a drop of intoxicating liquors during the next half century our land would be much improved. I am also of the opinion that if all our people attended divine services each Sunday and during week days with the utmost strictness fashioned their ways to Christian principles, the millennial dawn would soon be here. I know that if our homes could be governed entirely by unselfishness, kindliness, and love, we should be able to do away with most of our litigation and all of our jails. If I thought I could bring about such a moral advance by voting to enforce it by law, I should gladly vote in this House to do so; but if history teaches me anything, it is that men can not be made good by statute.

As a legislator here I must vote not for what men ought to be but for what they are. For thousands of years they have been stimulating themselves by the use of intoxicants. Those who have overdone it have been few as compared to the vast number in all ages who have enjoyed the mild use of wine and beer. The Father of His Country manufactured at Mount Vernon a total of 12,000 gallons of whisky. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why he was not too proud to fight. Gen. Grant was so proficient in its use as to lead Lincoln to facetiously inquire of the prohibitionists of his day whether he could not give some of the same brand to others in order that they might fight better. Millions of good citizens of our country in times past have imbibed according to their wants or needs.

By a survival of Puritanism the prohibition movement sought to make all citizens cease drinking by statute. The very good people of each State, usually by small majorities, enacted such laws. They passed the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act. But they did not take away from the minority, numbering millions, the mild taste for spirituous liquors. That taste remains. These see no wrong in such mild use, even though the majority have made it a crime. Hence we have a growing disrespect for a law which seeks to enforce a mere opinion, a growing hypocrisy in Congress and out about pretending to be for a regulation which is contrary to the habits of human nature, and a growing field for corruption of officials who find difficulty in sustaining a rigorous statute which is not upheld by the universal sentiment of the people. Prohibition does not and can not prohibit in our great cities, and it lends encouragement to disregard of all law.

I shall therefore not vote for any amendment to the Volstead Act except that which will restore to the minority its individual right to the use of wine and beer in such quantities as will not interfere with the welfare of others. We have enough real crimes, which everybody recognizes should be repressed by the utmost rigor of the law, without entering the domain of innocuous and harmless personal habit. The great minority throughout the country and the great majority in our cosmopolitan centers being what they are, it can not but follow that further tightening of an unpopular attempt to invade what they believe to be matters which concern them solely as individuals will be provocative only of further hypocrisy. In the long run it can succeed no more than the enactment by Congress of a law to compel all men to cut their hair alike. Nearly half of the country will submit, though in a minority, to being told that their children must be educated, for that is a good which has no minority opinion; but they will submit only in name to a law which prescribes that they shall not mildly use liquors which they and their fathers have found added to their enjoyment without causing injury to them or the community unless carried to that excess which is harmful and inexcusable in all things.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I was very much interested in the statement made by the young man from New York [Mr. RYAN] when he said that the American Federation of Labor was 100 per cent in favor of light wines and beer. During the last 10 days there has been a great convention of the American Federation of Labor at Denver, Colo., and one of the questions that came before that body was light wines and beer. According to the newspaper reports, it is true that the convention went on record in favor of permitting the sale of light wines and beer. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to challenge the authority of Mr. Gompers or the executive council of the American Federation of Labor to speak for the working classes on economic questions, but I do challenge the authority of Mr. Gompers and the executive council of the American Federation of Labor to speak for the workingmen of this country on moral questions. [Applause.] I think I can prove in just a minute that Mr. Gompers and the American Federation of Labor do not express the sentiment of the workingmen in this country on this great moral question. I want the workingmen to have the chance to speak for themselves on this question. In 1918 we had a wet and dry election on prohibition in the State of Ohio. At that time, in 1918, I believe the State went for prohibition by eighteen or twenty thousand. The wet interests howled and said that we took advantage of them while the soldiers of the country were away in France, and they insisted on having another test, and we gave them another chance in 1919, after the soldiers had come back, and at that time Ohio voted for prohibition by upward of between seventy and eighty thousand majority. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, we have many working classes and some great industrial centers in Ohio. Ohio is the fourth greatest industrial State of the Union. I want to give you the vote in four of the largest industrial counties in the State of Ohio on the question of prohibition in 1919. Franklin County, in which is situated the city of Columbus, with its thousands of mechanics and workingmen, voted dry that year by 17,000. Mahoning County, which is one of the greatest steel districts in the country, which has about 30,000 or 40,000 men working in its steel plants, gave 12,000 majority for prohibition. Summit County, in which is located the city of Akron, which has the largest rubber industry in the entire world, gave a majority for prohibition of 10,000, and Stark County, another great industrial center, gave a majority for prohibition of 7,000 or 8,000. So I say that the action of the American Federation of Labor at their convention in Denver last week did not speak the sentiments of the workingmen of this country.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not now. A short time ago Mr. Gompers was quoted as making the statement—and I want to say that I have no quarrel with him; I just do not agree with him on all things; and if I had been a delegate to the convention at Denver last week I would have voted for Mr. Gompers, because I believe he is the best man in that place at this time, and in many respects I consider him one of the greatest labor leaders the world has ever produced. As I was about to say, some time ago Mr. Gompers was quoted as making this statement:

> In my journeys through the United States I have yet to come in contact with anyone who did not damn prohibition up hill and down dale. I have not met one man who has said to me that he was in favor of prohibition just as it stands to-day.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know who the people were that Mr. Gompers met in his travels, but I know he did not find the workingmen of our country damning prohibition. About the same time Mr. Gompers made this statement the Literary Digest published a symposium under the title "Labor's Verdict on Prohibition," compiled from 526 replies from prominent workers and labor leaders throughout the country in answer to the question addressed them by the Digest, "Has prohibition been a benefit to the workingmen and their families?" in which 345 replied that it has been, and but 143 that it has not; 31 were doubtful, and 7 thought prohibition had not yet been given a fair trial. It will be noted that in this symposium 65 per cent of all who answered favor prohibition, while only 35 per cent were against it, including in those against it the doubtful and those who feel that prohibition has not been given a fair trial.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make this statement in defense of the thousands of honest law-abiding workingmen who resent the lying inference that they are the spokesmen for those who want to bring back the sale of intoxicating liquors in defiance and direct violation of the Constitution of our country. We have heard a great deal to-day about the enforcement of the prohibition law—some Members here have stated that it can not be enforced. I must confess that I do not like to hear a Member of Congress make such a statement, for I believe that when such a statement is made by a Member of this body it has a tendency to encourage the very act of committing the crime. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the day will never come in this fair land of ours when we can not enforce the constituted law of our country, for when that comes all liberty will cease and anarchy will begin.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CLASSON] in speaking in opposition to this bill a few minutes ago called our attention to the so-called demonstration against the prohibition law which is scheduled to take place in New York City July 4, and he seemed to express some feeling of pride in the fact that many thousands were going to take part in this parade. Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin knows that if the people of New York City want the liquor and saloon back there is an orderly way for them to proceed, and that is to amend the Constitution; the people of New York can march from now till doomsday, they may blow their horns and trumpets till the walls of the Woolworth Building crumble and fall, but our Government will never permit them to violate the law of the land. The gentleman from Wisconsin told us of the large number of women that were going to take part in this demonstration. Now, I know that he will not contend that these women who take part in this demonstration express the sentiment of the womanhood of our land, for it would be an insult to the motherhood of our country to say that they desired the return of the saloon and the liquor traffic. But on the other hand the mothers of our land are down on their knees thanking God that their sons and daughters are at last free from the temptation of the saloon of the past and the demoralizing evil of the liquor traffic. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal to-day about beer as a medicine. The best physicians of our country have never contended that beer was useful for medicinal purposes, but on the other hand prominent physicians all over our country are protesting against permitting beer to be made and sold for medicinal use.

And, Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to insert as part of my remarks a protest that I have received from some very prominent physicians on this question:

KANE, PA., April 8, 1921.

Hon. JOHN G. COOPER,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: The appended is a list of physicians, members of the McKean County Medical Society, who united in the following resolution:

"We urge Congress to make it its business to correct the law so as to prevent the brewing interests from making the medical profession a party to the sale of malt liquors through 'booze' prescriptions, as it appears it may through the late ruling of ex-Attorney General Palmer."

It is earnestly desired that you make every effort to protect us from the imputation of being little better than bartenders.

Very respectfully, yours,

EVAN O'NEILL KANE.

List of above-named physicians: G. E. Benninghoff, G. G. Ash, Fred C. Johnson, F. De Crerie, F. W. Paton, James B. Stewart, H. A. Canfield, B. J. White, H. J. Nichols, H. Irvin Woodhead, T. O. Glenn, H. A. Wilson, E. M. McLean, R. K. Russell, B. H. Hall, Persis Straight Robbins, A. Grace White, L. D. Joseph, S. H. Haines, F. R. Humphreys, T. A. Dunn, W. J. McGranor, J. W. King, J. H. Smith, J. W. Fredericks, J. H. Smith, O. S. Hannumtin, William C. Hogan, H. M. Cleveland, H. K. Eamon, Burg Chadwick, W. A. Ostrander, A. J. Colcord, Dr. Hanna, S. G. Beatty, E. H. Hickman, Milo W. Cox, J. M. Heimbach, L. W. Dana, Mary J. Hales, D. E. Vogan, Thomas L. Kane, Evan O'Neill Kane.

Mr. Speaker and fellow Members, let us meet this question like men. We have all taken an oath to support and defend the Constitution of our country. The Constitution prohibits the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors as beverages, and it is our solemn duty now to do everything in our power to live up to our oath of office and see to it that the law of the land shall be enforced to the letter as long as it remains on our statute books. [Applause.]

Mr. CLASSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the prohibition question has been tried throughout the country for several years. The general opinion of the people that I meet is that as a consequence there are more bootleggers and lawbreakers in the country at this time than there ever were at any time in its history. I have frequently stated on this floor that prohibition would ultimately lead to serious lawbreaking. The man who feels that he wants a drink of some kind as a stimulant, or even as a medicine, is going to get it, law or no law. If he is successful in getting it a good many times without being caught at it, he feels that it is only one step further to break a very serious law, and he too often does that. In my honest opinion this kind of legislation makes men liars, sneaks, hypocrites. I remember stating on this floor some years ago that, after all, the first law that was broken by man was a prohibition law, and the first law that was given to man was a prohibition law.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. No. I regret I have not the time. Let me call your attention to the Bible and to the description of the formation of the earth. The Almighty, after having created all things, turned to Adam and Eve and said, in effect: "This is all yours, to have, to enjoy, to hold, and to possess; but in that corner over there there is one tree; I prohibit you from eating of the fruit of that tree." That was the first prohibition law. As soon as the Almighty was out of sight, they ate of the fruit of that tree and broke the law. And then Adam, like a liar, sneak, and hypocrite, blamed it all on the woman.

Mr. PADGETT rose.

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield to the gentleman. I am simply pointing out to you that there is something in human nature which makes us want to get something that we are told we can not have. That is an instinct in the human being that is as old as the world itself.

I believe this thing ought to be handled in a rational way; and this prohibition legislation you all know is not rational. Gentlemen all know that the law is being violated every day of the week and every hour of the day. There is drunkenness all over the country to-day, despite the prohibition law. I do not drink myself. I believe in absolute temperance. But there are men here who vote for prohibition who drink more in one week than I do in one year. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEAL].

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the enactment into law of the bill under discussion, or any legislation having for its object more stringent and drastic legislation than existing law. Indeed, I am of the conviction that it would be wise to modify existing laws. It were better far to permit the use of light wines and beer than have an illicit trade in alcohols that are poisonous, dangerous to health, and destroyers of life. If there be a majority of this body holding the opposite view, then surely they should be content to rest upon the laurels already won and not drive to desperation masses of people who otherwise desire to be law-abiding citizens, especially when there are so many causes for unrest and discontent. With those who conscientiously hold other opinions I have no quarrel. Let me say that I stand here not as one pleading the case of any man or class of men. Nor am I pleading, in any sense, personal interest, except in so far as a policy encroaches upon individual rights and establishes precedents tending, in my humble opinion, to destroy the principles upon which our Government was founded.

MODERATION IS A VIRTUE.

Moderation and temperance are synonymous. St. Paul said we should "be temperate in all things"—that is to say, temperate in speech, temperate in action, temperate in eating, temperate in the use of tobacco and of strong drink, and especially should we be temperate in the making of laws for the guidance and control of human beings. That temperate laws prohibiting unlimited and unrestrained manufacture, traffic, and use of alcoholic beverages elevates the moral tone of society I shall not deny, but that intemperate laws have a demoralizing influence I likewise submit. The extent of the harmful influence of either can not be calculated. If it be a sin to indulge in the excessive use of alcohol or tobacco or opiates, then why is it not equally sinful to indulge in excessive and extreme regulatory laws which likewise result in the corruption of the morals of society? Again, St. Paul said:

They that sin, though they condemn it in others, can not excuse themselves.

What excuse therefore can we offer for the enactment of laws which are not respected, which prompt vast numbers to resentment and a contempt of law? I do not have reference solely to the prohibition laws, but to any intemperate law, excessive taxation, or regulation of one's actions which do not regulate because they do not have the support of the masses. It can scarcely be denied that our so-called prohibition laws are exceedingly intemperate, interfering and meddling with established rights and privileges of human beings—privileges which have been enjoyed by the human race for more than 6,000 years, privileges which the Lord did not deem it wise or necessary to write into His code of morals—the Ten Commandments—nor does He seem to have forbidden the temperate use of alcoholic beverages. While opposed myself to the unrestrained traffic in alcoholic beverages as exemplified by the saloon, I believe that man should not be restrained from the right, within the sacred precincts of his home, to make wine for his own use, even as Christ did at the marriage feast. A man's home is his castle, be it ever so humble. To him it is sacred, and so long as he violates no law of the Great Giver of all things nor trespasses upon the rights of others, it should not be the privilege of his fellow man to invade the private recesses of that home. It was Dickens, I believe, who said that he "could well understand the patriotism and love of the rich man for his home of comfort and luxury, but the patriotism and love of the poor man for his humble hearth is welded from a stronger mold and of purer steel." Be that as it may, the home of each is to him sacred. Permit him to enjoy that home in his own way and you have a patriotic and loyal supporter of the Government. Cross that threshold by laws to him vexatious, irritating, and nauseating, and we sow the seeds of discontent, unrest, contempt and hatred of the law, from which we will sooner or later reap a whirlwind.

THE EXTREME IN ANY LINE OF ENDEAVOR IS ATTENDED WITH DANGER.

That extremes are dangerous may be illustrated in many ways. Certainly the excessive use of alcohol is dangerous to health, to morals, to society. The same is true of extreme and drastic laws. This was recognized by Jefferson when he said that "the best governed are the least governed."

Being a temperate man, he, of course, had in mind temperate laws. The occasion for any form of government, as I understand it, is to protect human life, property rights, sanctity of the home, and human endeavor. All government in the higher acceptation of the idea derives its powers from the consent of the governed. Laws, therefore, are supposed to lay down general principles for the guidance not of specific individuals but of all individuals. It would seem unreasonable, therefore, in order to regulate one intemperate individual and curtail his opportunity for self-punishment that fifty temperate individuals should be denied a pleasure which does not trespass upon the rights or privileges of others. Whenever government has undertaken to regulate the religion and the morals of its citizens, bloodshed, destruction of property, and contempt of law and order have followed, and, to my mind, have far overbalanced any good which may have resulted from conservative laws.

The idea appears to prevail that under our form of government the majority should rule, that minorities have no rights which should be respected by the majorities. This is not true in its entirety. There are certain fundamental rights which should be guaranteed to the minority. The founders of our Government recognized this necessity; hence a solemn contract was drawn and entered into by the Government, on the one part, and the people, on the other, in which certain rights were ceded to the Federal Government, which rights were specifically named. All other rights were reserved by the governed. And early statesmen foresaw that waves of sentiment, resentment, malice, envy, war, fanaticism, and even mobocracy would ebb and flow with the years, and therefore the occasion for a binding contract, which would safeguard the rights of the minority. That the masses of our people have demanded the eighteenth amendment, and the drastic laws incident thereto, I deny. That they have cast their ballots for the abolition of the saloon, I agree. When this so-called temperance wave first began, there was no suggestion, so far as I am aware, of an amendment to our Federal Constitution prohibiting the manufacture, sale, and transportation of alcoholic beverages and ceding to the Federal Government extraordinary police powers belonging exclusively to the State. The very name "Anti-Saloon League" suggests the intent and purpose of the movement, and it was for this that the American people voted.

I submit that the leaders of this movement would not dare to-day to give to the masses of our people the opportunity to pass upon the repeal of the eighteenth amendment or the passage of the bill under consideration. We of the South used as an argument for prohibiting the traffic in alcohols that we would prevent disorders in our rural districts incident to drunkenness among the colored race, thereby making our highways and public places safe, and create better labor conditions. As a result we have turned the traffic over to that element of society. We have upon the market poisonous concoctions, injurious to health, and our labor has become grossly inefficient. May I not venture the suggestion that if every adult man and woman in our Southern States had been permitted to cast a ballot upon this subject no majority could ever have been had in favor of the eighteenth amendment or the Volstead law. Permit me to say that by the submission of the eighteenth amendment and its ratification we have surrendered our vaunted liberties to a greater extent than by any other act in the history of our country. We have placed in the hands of one man—the President of the United States of America—powers of persecution possessed by no other ruler of a white race, with the possible exception of Russia. That it may be used with moderation for the time being does not alter the fact that the powers thus granted may be used by some future autocrat and tyrant to persecute, blackmail, punish political opponents, and drive the masses into submission to the tyrant's will. What is there to-day to prevent the powers that be in Washington from placing spies upon the trail of any citizen in Maine or California or other State of the Union and for some trifling violation of any of a hundred drastic laws, punishable by prison sentence, arrest him and thus silence the activities of a political opponent?

Any law to which a majority of those whom it is intended to control is opposed can not be enforced. Any law, as a result of which large profits may be realized, never has and in my judgment never will be enforced. Laws that can not be enforced lead to contempt and derision of all law.

The drastic alcoholic prohibition laws of the Nation being a departure from an established privilege coming down through the ages, there are no precedents or experiences to guide intelligent thought directly as to the probable consequences. The nearest parallel may be found in laws against smuggling and the results incident thereto. Indeed, smuggling is most largely responsible for the Government's inability to control the production and use of alcoholic beverages. Smith, an English authority, quoted in the Cyclopedia of Political Science, Economy, and History, says that—> the crime of smuggling, which occupies so prominent a place in the criminal legislation of all modern States, is wholly the result of vicious commercial and financial legislation. It is the fruit either of prohibitions of importations or of oppressively high duties. It does not originate in any depravity inherent in man but in the folly and ignorance of legislators.

It can not be said that the submission and ratification of the eighteenth amendment, and the drastic laws incident thereto, have resulted from ignorance. It has been said—with what degree of accuracy I know not—that had a secret ballot been taken upon the submission of the eighteenth amendment it would not have been submitted. Again, says Smith—

> Prohibition against importing a commodity does not take away the taste for it. Governments have usually consulted tax collectors as to the most effectual means of collecting duties, though it is clear that the interest, prejudice, and peculiar habits of such persons utterly disqualify them from forming a sound opinion on such a subject.

The prohibitionist is not interested in the matter of revenue but in regulating the individual in conformity to his views. We have undertaken a far greater problem in that, regardless of revenue, we say, Thou shalt not smuggle or use. The profit and incentive therefor transcends any results of smuggling heretofore engaged in. Our prohibition-enforcement officers, like the tax gatherers, unwilling to admit their inability to enforce, claim and will continue to claim defect in laws; hence the bill under discussion. And we will no doubt have a continuation of amendments to laws already so drastic as to create contempt for law and the imposition of new and severer penalties.

Continuing, Smith says:

> As might have been expected, these attempts have in the great majority of cases proved signally unsuccessful, and it has been invariably found that no vigilance on the part of the revenue officers can prevent smuggling of such commodities as are either prohibited or loaded with excessive duties. The smuggler is generally a popular character, and whatever the law may declare on the subject it is ludicrous to expect that the bulk of society should ever be brought to think that those who furnish them with cheap brandy, tobacco, etc., are guilty of any very heinous offense.

Multiply the conditions resulting, not from high import duties but by actual prohibition, denying under any condition the manufacture, importation, transportation, and use of stimulants which nature craves, and which has been always until now a privilege and right, and we accentuate enforcement difficulties an hundredfold. Prohibition will not prohibit, and if public sentiment does not support a law it can never be enforced. In 1826 England prohibited the importation of foreign silks. The vigilance and integrity of the customhouse officers were no match for the ingenuity and daring of smugglers. When the greatest effort was being displayed by enforcement officers, French silks were openly displayed in the House of Commons. I recently read that in a city of my own State alcoholic beverages were discovered stored in the courthouse. The success of smuggling was due, as stated by the aforesaid authority, "to the corruption of the enforcement officers." It is currently believed to-day that some of our prohibition officers are in some instances conniving, if not actually aiding, in the dispensation of alcoholic beverages. In the Gentleman's Magazine, published in England, for 1735, under date of September 3, a correspondent writes that "in several parts of Kent the farmers are obliged to raise wages, and yet are distressed for want of hands to get in their harvest, due to the great numbers engaged in smuggling."

The Rev. R. S. Hawker, of Morwenstown, Wales, tells as apropos of his unavailing effort to combat tax views respecting smuggling. He was answered with "but why should the King tax good liquor." In 1736 in course of debate in the House of Commons it was stated that in France where smuggling of all kinds was punishable by death on the gallows, an army called Les Moltotiers were kept for the purpose of apprehending and inflicting the punishment, and yet smuggling in that Kingdom was as flagrant as in England. I have not a doubt but that this law will be enacted and that at each succeeding Congress additional amendments will be proposed. I am interested to know how soon an amendment will come providing a death penalty for those who may violate our prohibition laws.

The casting of Christians into the arena to be rent and torn to death by wild beasts, the Spanish inquisition, the burning of 300 citizens at the stake during the reign of "Bloody Mary," the ducking and murder of witches in our own country because of their beliefs and desires, only occasioned the spread and growth of the things it was sought to destroy. Are we blind to the experiences of recorded history? Ah, but we are told "it is not in this generation that the millenium will come, only with the coming generations will we see the curse of the world buried and forgotten." History repeats itself. Another generation, if not this, will answer the statement, and answer it as in the past. It has been stated by a supporter of the measure under discussion that the same old arguments against prohibition are being used by its opponents; no doubt this is true, but it is the same old story of plucking the mote from thy brother's eye before removing the beam from thine own eye. Yes; and we will continue to hear these arguments and others, till there are modifications of the intemperate laws now upon our statutes. Does any person seriously feel that the craving for stimulants inherent in all races and in all ages can be eradicated by man-made laws?

Mr. CLASSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. OLPP].

Mr. OLPP. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have heard a great many arguments here this afternoon about what the good doctor says about beer. Well, I am not going to argue the question of whether alcohol is necessary or not. If it is or is not necessary in respect to treating certain cases, and if you have to limit the physician in the amount he is going to use, I do not see where and how a committee that knows nothing about medicine could limit them if they use it as a medicine. They say that alcohol is not in the Pharmacopœia, but alcohol is something used in tinctures. Well, there is milk and a lot of other things that is not in the Pharmacopœia. It is only to reason out the question of beer and light wines. Do we need these wines for sacramental purposes? No one gets up and says we do not, and yet we are allowed in some instances as high as 10 gallons a year. During the time I spent in the Army we were mighty glad to get carloads of alcohol, which was in the form of whisky and liquors.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLPP. I will.

Mr. HILL. Did not the gentleman serve as an Army doctor in the late war?

Mr. OLPP. I did, sir; as a first lieutenant. And you allow us, as physicians, to prescribe spirituous liquors and wines——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLPP. I have not the time now. Wait until I have finished the sentence. You allow us to prescribe a certain amount of liquor. I do not use it myself and I prescribe very little of it, but I have prescribed beer following an operation in order to settle the stomach and to stop vomiting, when beer and nothing else would do it. And what I wish to know, from a medical standpoint, is this: If these physicians say we do not need beer, why not enforce the law and do not allow anyone to use it and not limit us in case we should require it and then have us come to Washington and ask the Commissioner whether we can prescribe any more than just a certain amount in case of emergency.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLASSON. May I inquire how the time stands?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin has 36 minutes.

Mr. CLASSON. And the others?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota has 21, and the gentleman from Texas 10, and the gentleman from Illinois 17.

Mr. CLASSON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT].

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, this bill, among other things, provides that it shall be unlawful for a physician to prescribe beer for a patient. It provides that only whisky and wine may be prescribed, and that the wine shall not contain more than 24 per cent alcohol by volume; that no prescription of wine shall be for more than 1 quart and that a prescription for whisky shall not contain more than one-half pint of alcohol. I understand this to mean that the whisky prescribed by the doctor may be any quantity, but the whole quantity can not contain more than one-half pint of pure alcohol. The bill furthermore provides that the patient may only have one prescription during a period of 10 days and that a physician shall only be furnished with 100 prescription blanks in any period of 90 days, but that the prohibition commissioner for an extraordinary reason may permit a larger number.

I can not support this bill. I voted against the submission of the prohibition amendment and I voted against the Volstead Act and all other prohibition measures, and I feel that experience has justified the course which I have pursued. I have always felt, and feel now, that the prohibition amendment should not be a part of the Constitution. The eighteenth amendment is a freak in the Constitution. The Federal Government was founded for the purpose of enabling the States to do collectively those things which they could not as efficiently do for themselves. It was not intended to transfer to the Federal Government the jurisdiction over matters of local concern.

The framers of the Constitution never intended that the habits of the people should be regulated by the Federal Government. The Federal Constitution is a charter of human rights, and the eighteenth amendment is the only part of the Constitution which denies a human right. I do not think that the people of other States should have the right to dictate what the people of Wisconsin should eat or drink. I have felt and feel now that the people of my State should have the right to determine those things for themselves.

I feel that any legislation which attempts to regulate the habits of the people is bad, because it interferes with the traditional personal liberty for which America has always stood. Prohibition is a moral question addressed largely to the individual, and I believe it is unwise to attempt to legislate morality into the people.

We all know that the enforcement of the prohibition law is a farce. In my judgment, it is impossible to measurably enforce the Volstead Act without the expenditure of a billion dollars a year. Thousands and thousands of people are drinking harmful whisky and other concoctions to-day who, before the period of prohibition, occasionally drank a glass of wine or beer. I do not consider it wise policy to interfere with the personal liberty of a law-abiding citizen because here and there some man can not control his appetite for liquor. In my humble judgment, it will never be possible to enforce prohibition in the United States. Man has always wanted something stronger than water since he has been on this earth, and he is going to get it in spite of all the laws that can be passed. I do not advocate a violation of the law, but I can not close my eyes to the fact that prohibition laws will be violated by the wholesale, because they are not supported by public sentiment.

This bill provides that a doctor may prescribe 100 per cent alcohol or 24 per cent wine for a patient, but he can not prescribe 3 or 4 per cent beer. If Congress thinks that alcohol is dangerous, why do we allow a doctor to prescribe whisky, but do not allow him to prescribe a mild beer? The whole thing looks to me like the rankest kind of hypocrisy. It is proposed in this bill to let a doctor give whisky or wine to the first hundred men who come to him in three months' time. The unfortunate fellow who comes along after the first hundred, and who may need it worse than the first hundred, can not get any. If we are going to allow a doctor to prescribe whisky, we should treat all people alike.

A good deal has been said as to the medicinal value of beer. I know from personal knowledge that doctors have advised people to take beer, and I also know from personal knowledge that a glass of beer has proved beneficial to many patients.

By depriving the people of beer we are creating a disrespect for the law, and we are virtually compelling people to seek strong liquor. There are millions of people in this country who would not drink whisky if they could get beer. I believe that the solution of the prohibition question at this time would be to permit the people to have beer and light wine. The prohibition amendment does not compel Congress to prohibit beer. The prohibition amendment provides that there shall be no manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquor. The overwhelming evidence is that a 3 or 4 per cent beer is not intoxicating. There is a growing sentiment in the country for light alcoholic drinks, and I predict that in the next few years public sentiment will compel Congress to change the present drastic restrictions.

The prohibition movement in this country has brought about a condition where a rich man can get all he wants to drink. The rich men have filled their cellars and are still able to get it. I have never seen a man who had the money who could not get all the whisky and wine that he wanted. As to him, conditions have not changed; only the system of bookkeeping has changed. The laboring man who can not afford to pay the exorbitant prices is being denied his glass of beer. The American Federation of Labor at its annual meeting at Denver last week, by a unanimous vote, adopted a resolution asking Congress to restore beer. I compliment the Federation on its good sense.

Let us pass laws which have the support of public sentiment. It is a dangerous thing to pass laws which we know are going to be violated by the wholesale, because it will breed a disrespect for all other laws. I am not going to vote for a law which will make hypocrites, liars, and thieves out of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. CLASSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the eighteenth amendment on the ground I did not believe in putting social legislation into the Constitution, and I think that vote and the vote of the others who thought as I do, has been amply justified by the result, for I do not think that the cause of temperance has been helped but rather injured by that amendment. I do not see the wisdom or necessity of continuing to make more drastic the provisions of the Volstead Act, which has not been enforceable but is being less and less observed, so that in the section of the country I know about there appears to be more and more drunkenness every month. Now, a bill which permits the prescription of spirituous and vinous liquors running anywhere from 50 down to 10 per cent of alcohol and prohibits the prescription of liquor which is only 4 per cent alcohol can hardly be defended on logical grounds. I can not enter in the short time at my disposal upon any discussion as to the value of beer either as a tonic or medicine, but I expect to incorporate as a part of my remarks a letter which I have received this very day from Mr. William P. Hornaday, of New York, a New York man, whom most of the people of the United States recognize as one of the greatest naturalists, one of the leading scientists of this country and of international reputation.

He says:

STAMFORD, CONN., June 24, 1921.

Hon. SCHUYLER MERRITT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MERRITT: When sweeping prohibition reaches the cot of the sick man and the chair of the invalid, it is time to cry "Halt"!

We are living in the United States of America, and not in fanatical India, where a Hindoo will die of starvation rather than save his life with food prepared by Christian hands.

In my own behalf, and in behalf of an uncountable number of Americans whose views I reflect, I denounce the policy of no malt drinks for medical uses, and I demand the enactment of a sane and just measure that will provide beer, ale, and stout when prescribed by reputable physicians as medicine. For all sick persons I demand a square deal.

I am a strict temperance man. I hate saloons and gin mills; I disapprove of all those who sell whisky, brandy, rum, and gin for use by well and strong men as beverages. My father was a tectotaler. I was a teetotaler until I was 20 years old. When my life was saved in the jungles of India by a well-known malt beverage I learned the value of such remedial agents. Thirty years ago I learned the high value of another malt beverage as a cure for impoverished blood and anemia.

I now could cite from my own experience a striking occurrence of very recent date, but to do so in this letter would invite derision from those who disapprove my proposal. The matter is too serious for ridicule, and I will reserve it for a different occasion.

Through you I call upon the House of Representatives to be reasonable next Monday and to refuse to invade the hospital and the sick room with a Brahminical law against the use of malt beverages as medicines. I call upon Members of the House to be sane and just minded Americans, and not the slaves of one idea alone. The folly of too much prohibition already has been demonstrated. Why drive temperance people into the ranks of the wets? Give the sick man a square deal. Give the invalid the benefit of any doubt that may exist. The American people can not be turned into Hindoo devotees by an act of Congress.

I call for a new deal next Monday. I call upon the "drys" in the House to be as good temperance men as I am and to provide malt beverages for sick people who are certified as in need of them.

Yours, for sanity and justice,

WILLIAM T. HORNADAY.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Connecticut and to the House that the permission to extend remarks is limited to the Members' own remarks.

Mr. MERRITT. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks. I have read this in my own remarks. [Cries of "Vote, vote!"]

Mr. CLASSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have listened very attentively to the various men who have made talks on this prohibition proposition. I would like to be consistent, and I think from the calls for a vote at the present time there must be a number drier than I am, and that is "going some." I voted against prohibition when I was in the House before, and I am glad I did so, because the experience of the past two years proves that it has been very injurious to men. They let it out in carload lots at 190 proof. They will not let out a good rye six or seven years old, at 110 or 150 proof.

The matter with the men who advocate prohibition is that they are making too many laws. I trust every man will live up to the law. I like to do so. But whether a man preaches prohibition or not on this floor, I am very often asked, "Mike, where may I get a good, strong stimulant?" They do not say, "How do you get it?" [Laughter.] Therefore I am opposed, not to a sensible prohibition law, but I am opposed to this particular bill, telling medical men what they shall prescribe to the patients when the patients are not yet taken sick, and not what they will give them when they are taken sick. It is one of the strangest things to me. Light wine and beer are good, but you want the 100 per cent proof if you desire a pure stimulant. I am in favor of letting it go as it always was, regulated by Government supervision, and not by prohibition measures and enforcing officers who probably do not like to enforce the law. Like ourselves, they make a law for themselves, and they do not let it strike home to the men who have it in their cellars, the rich men. They can enjoy it, and there are no questions asked whether they had it before the storm set in three years ago or not, but the poor working man, who has but a small mite, and who returns from the rolling mill at night tired and in need of a stimulant, should be considered. And the day is fast approaching when he will be heard from. And God speed the day. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, so far as my observation goes, all the gentlemen who have opposed this legislation, according to their statements—I do not challenge their veracity—have been teetotalers for many years. I presume it therefore follows as a natural consequence that those of us who favor the bill are anything but teetotalers. Consequently, if that impression be correct, we not only have to save ourselves, but we have to save the country.

My distinguished friend from California [Mr. KAHN], who was on the floor a while ago, undertook to justify the opposition to the bill upon an incident that occurred in the Garden of Eden. But I am now here to tell the gentleman that I know men in this House—no; perhaps not in this House, but in the country—who would ride a jackass into the Garden of Eden and hitch him to the tree of life. [Applause.]

The measure before us is founded upon a constitutional provision, a fundamental organic act of the people, and it remains for us to carry that provision into execution. The matter of the enforcement of the act remains for the administrative department of the Government. Whenever the time shall arrive, if it ever does arrive—and I do not expect it to come—when that law shall collapse, break down, and fail, then the representatives of the people, reflecting the opinion of the people in their districts, will take whatever measures may be necessary looking to an orderly change in that organic act. But so long as the Constitution remains in its present form, just so long the duty is superimposed upon every Member of this body to carry into execution the mandate of the people to the very best of his ability.

Law is but crystallized public opinion, and whenever public opinion ceases to reinforce an act, then that act will no longer have any force or effect, because it will not be enforced. But that time has not yet arrived, and in the light of intelligent public opinion of this country, in view of the hope and the aspiration of the Nation, and of every integral member thereof, we have every reason to believe that this adventure—if I may call it an adventure—into a new domain of law, something never attempted before in morals and in ethics, will in the end redound to the honor and the glory of those who conceived it and of those who put it into execution. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman already has that privilege.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back the balance of his time.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I yield that time to my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. ROSENBLOOM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for one minute.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I occupy a peculiar position, as evidenced by the fact that my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ] was kind enough to yield to me the remainder of his time.

I was somewhat amazed at the arguments that have been presented here to-day. I understood the discussion would be confined strictly to the provisions of this bill, but I was very much amazed to find that practically the entire time has been consumed by men of many years of experience in this body in the discussion of a measure that was not before us at all. The principal argument I heard and the greatest amount of time was used in the discussion of the merits of useless legislation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for one minute.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote against this bill. I know there are dishonest doctors, and the reason for the framing of this bill is to prevent dishonest doctors giving dishonest prescriptions; but this bill, in effect, is an indictment of the entire medical fraternity, and a governmental dictation to them in their practice of medicine. I do not believe they deserve it. This bill does not decree that spirituous and vinous liquor is not a medicine. In fact, it declares the contrary, and then fixes what quantity of it may be given to restore health or save life.

Furthermore, if a prescription for a pint of whisky for 10 days' consumption by a strong man is a prescription at all, it seems to me it is a ridiculous one. I am speaking honestly and straight about it. The truth of the business is, I never touch it myself. There was a time when I used it. I know what it is. I know what evils come of drunkenness. But I will not indict the entire medical profession because there are some dishonest doctors, just as there are some shyster lawyers. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this bill is spoken of and advocated as an anti-beer bill. It is claimed that because the ex-Attorney General ruled that beer might be sold to a sick person on a physician's prescription this bill is necessary in order to prevent breweries being reestablished and saloons reinstalled to make and sell beer on prescription. But that is not all or even the more important part of the bill. Beer may not be a medicine of any virtue whatever. If we as a lawmaking body are willing to assume that we know that, we may forbid its prescription. I, for one, am not willing to invade the sphere of the physician and direct him what he shall not in any case prescribe. But even that, in my judgment, is a minor matter, as, to say the least, beer is rarely prescribed by physicians in critical or immediately dangerous sickness.

As I understand it, it is prescribed as a tonic, in rare cases. The more serious part of the bill has to do with spirituous and vinous liquor. Certainly when the States ratified the amendment prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, they did not thereby authorize Congress to practice medicine or prescribe the kind or quantity of medicine that should be given in the treatment of diseases.

Let me quote the bill:

> No physician shall prescribe * * * any vinous liquor that contains more than 24 per cent of alcohol by volume—
>
> Or—
> on any prescription more than one-fourth of 1 gallon of vinous liquor, or any liquor that contains more than one-half pint of alcohol for use by any person within any period of 10 days.

If that provision of the bill is wise, then, I say, a wiser provision would have been one prohibiting any prescription whatever of the kind named. I do not believe any doctor or any man of common sense will claim that a patient might for medicine need in 10 days as much as one-half pint, but could not need a spoonful more, regardless of the nature of his sickness.

Vinous liquor or other liquor containing alcohol either is good for medicine or it is not. If it is good, the restriction named is ridiculous; if it is not good, why was it not absolutely prohibited along with beer? If I had followed the path of least resistance, regardless of my judgment and convictions, I would have said nothing and voted for the bill, but, believing as I do, I could not vote that way and preserve my self-respect. I intend, without any reservation whatever, to vote for any law necessary to the full enforcement of the eighteenth amendment—that is, the prohibition of the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquor as a beverage—but I do not believe I am authorized under that amendment to practice or prescribe medicine or dictate to the medical school what it shall prescribe.

On this branch of the question let me quote a statement made to me by a Member of the House who is a physician and as honest a man as I know. This is his statement:

> Under the eighteenth or prohibition amendment of the Constitution of the United States a licensed physician is permitted to prescribe intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. The Campbell-Willis or so-called Volstead supplemental bill limits the quantity of alcohol that the licensed physician shall prescribe to a half pint in 10 days, and prevents the use of beer for medicinal purposes. Should this bill become a law, what would happen to a reputable licensed physician if he treated two patients as follows:
> First, a man with acute pneumonia and a failing heart, in which it will become necessary, according to his judgment, to prescribe a quart instead of a pint of whiskey during the 10 days. Hughes' Practice of Medicine, one of the best authorities we have, tenth edition, pages 138–139, says:
>
> "Heart failure being one of the most common causes of death in pneumonia, it is very important to sustain the heart from the very beginning. Alcoholic stimulants, judiciously employed, are most efficient means of preventing or overcoming the cardiac failure. The amount can only be determined by a careful study of each case, as a few ounces in the 24 hours may answer in one, while another may require 8 or 10 ounces. The indicator of the heart's condition is the pulse."
>
> It is not reasonable to believe that an intelligent patient would prefer to accept the dose prescribed by Dr. Congressman rather than the dose prescribed by the physician who has studied anatomy, physiology, and materia medica for the purpose of treating scientifically and intelligently. At any rate, suppose a conscientious physician, in order to save this patient, prescribes 2 quarts instead of 1 pint within the 10 days; what could the court do to him under the circumstances? Would he not be within his constitutional rights?
>
> Second. Suppose a reputable licensed physician is called to treat a case of nausea and vomiting in pregnancy and this patient is on the verge of starvation and heart failure. Suppose, further, in his judgment, that alcoholic stimulants are needed, and the patient is unable to retain whisky or wine, and he prescribes beer containing over one-half of 1 per cent and she retains it with marked improvement. Beer containing over one-half of 1 per cent having been declared by Congress an intoxicant, and the Constitution permitting a physician to use alcoholic intoxicants for medicinal purposes, what would become of the physician under those circumstances? Would a court hold that he was within his constitutional rights or a violator of the law? We know, for instance, that quinine is recommended for malaria. What lawmaker would want to confine a physician to the use of two preparations of quinine only, when we know that there are patients with certain idiosyncracies who do not retain one preparation and who retain another. The same applies to any other medicine in the materia medica.
> The Constitution permits spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors for medicinal purposes. The Campbell-Willis bill permits the use of whisky and wine, but prohibits the use of beer for medicinal purposes.

Mr. Chairman, it is argued in support of this bill that it is a good law, because many physicians do not ask for a license or permit to prescribe alcoholic stimulants. If that proves anything, it proves too much; that is, that such prescriptions are not required; and if that is true, and the framers of this bill so believed, why did they not prohibit absolutely any such prescription? The truth is, I am told, that many physicians do not take out such permits, because they do not want to be harassed and bedeviled, either by unworthy applications for prescriptions or by overzealous and all-powerful enforcement officers, who might besmirch their names as honorable practitioners.

Another paragraph of the bill gives one physician 100 prescriptions for use in 90 days, and no more, unless, with due humility, he approaches and applies at the throne of grace, the seat of the commissioner, with fullness of proof to satisfy this official that some extraordinary reason exists for a larger amount.

How many miles he must travel, how long a time it will take, how much proof he must furnish, will depend on the location and character of the commissioner. Mr. Chairman, I will gladly vote for any law to punish, and punish severely, any physician who prostitutes his high calling by giving liquor prescriptions to those who only want it as a beverage or who do not need it as a medicine, but I do not believe our people want this law or such a law as this. It was never intended that legislation should treat diseases or stand between the patient and his physician. What evils may follow in the wake of such a law no man knows. We have not yet quite reached the necessity of indicting and pronouncing unworthy of trust a whole profession, and especially that profession which in its ministrations approaches those of the Divine Healer more nearly than any other.

Mr. CLASSON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LAMPERT].

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the original Volstead Act and I voted to sustain President Wilson's veto in reference to war-time prohibition, and I am still here. My opponent in the primary, a former member of the Wisconsin Legislature, was indorsed by the Anti-Saloon League. During the primary campaign I caused to be published in the newspapers an extract from my platform to the effect that I was in favor of light wines and beer. My plurality was over 10,000 votes. In the general election that followed I received a majority of 26,835 votes and in my home city I received 400 votes more than were cast for President Harding. I refer to this simply to show that the people of the United States are not unanimous in favor of prohibition, even though our prohibition friends would have us believe that this thing has reached a stage were no one dares oppose it. I refer to it further to call attention to the fact that if a candidate for office goes before the people with a platform that is square and honest he can trust the result to the American people every time. My able and brilliant colleague from Wisconsin, Judge CLASSON, in opening the debate in opposition to this pernicious measure voiced my sentiments and voiced my prophecy, when he stated that the time would come "When the American people would rise up and demand a restoration of their personal liberty," saying "A plague on both your houses. We are acting for ourselves." That time will come as sure as I am standing here.

When this day of reckoning comes—and it will come too soon for many of you gentlemen, who vote not your conviction, who vote not in accordance with your own daily habits, but who seem to be in a sort of hypnotic state, lulled to sleep, I fear, by the professional reformers, who have left no stone unturned since the passage of the first Volstead Act to render it so drastic, so un-American, that it is now practically unenforecable. It is charged that a certain able lawyer is the author of this measure, which, if true, is unimportant. I am told he is now sitting in the gallery, satisfied with his work, satisfied that he has pulled all the strings and set all the wires to make this performance this afternoon a sort of colossal Punch and Judy show. I can not blame him; no doubt he is well paid; no doubt he earns it. I understand he is a good lawyer, and, like every lawyer, he is worthy of his hire.

I am not a prophet, neither am I the son of a prophet, but I did venture the prophecy some time ago that our paid professional reformers would undertake to go further, to further inflict their pernicious activities on the American people. I refer to the movement popularly known as "the blue Sunday" movement, which is fully as objectionable, fully as un-American, as the one started years ago, and on which we are putting the finishing touches to-day. This movement is already under way, and I am certain that it has gained such an impetus that in a very short time we will be assembled in this same room to consider bills, privileged like this one, which will prohibit the great majority of the American people, who love liberty, whose fathers and sons died for liberty, from indulging in harmless recreation on the Sabbath. Is it any wonder, gentlemen, that the professional activities of the Anti-Saloon League and other organzations of that ilk are a matter of deep concern to the liberty-loving Americans? That time is coming; they will put it over; and when it comes, God help this country.

I can remember a few years ago, when the prohibition amendment was first seriously debated on this floor, the great war cry of our reformers was "Drive out the saloon," "Drive the breweries out of politics." The great cry was then that the saloons were the breeding places, the hatching places of all crimes, and that once we were rid of the saloon and the brewery the millennium would be at hand. We could tear down our jails, dismantle our insane hospitals, dispense with all officers of the law. Oh, what a wild dream! Crime has increased. More insane commitments than ever before. In fact, gentlemen, the Volstead Act has popularized crime, investing it with a halo of romance. I hold no brief for the saloon of ill-repute, nor the millionaire brewery owner, who would not take notice of the handwriting on the wall. The ill-kept saloon and the brewery owner deserved what they got, and no sane real American can sympathize with them. But what do we find now? These blind fanatics, under the guise of reform, are not satisfied with what they have accomplished, but they now wish to invade the sanctity of the home, invade every man's castle. I am not a drinking man. Twenty-one years ago I came to the conclusion that I had consumed my share, and then I quit, but I do condemn and will continue to condemn as long as there is breath left in my body this unwarranted, vicious interference with the liberties of the American people. Oh, yes; the old cry was "Get rid of the saloon."

Nothing said then about prohibiting a doctor from prescribing alcohol as a medicine. Nothing was said then that would indicate that an American citizen could not indulge in a glass of beer, provided that he obtained it lawfully and did not have to visit a saloon to obtain it, but you see now where your professional reformers are leading you. They are not going to discontinue their activities to-day with the passage of this measure, neither will they discontinue their activities with the passage of the "blue law."

Now, all my life I have tried to be fair and to respect the opinions of others. I have in my district many high-minded men and women who honestly believe in and practice—practice, mind you—total abstinence. I have a high regard for their judgment, for their intelligence, and for their patriotism, and I am satisfied that these same people, if they knew of the vast amount of money used by these professional reformers, if they knew the methods used in behalf of certain legislation in Washington, they would condemn them and their methods as I am doing to-day. We have recently been enlightened through the columns of the Washington papers, and through letters that reached us through the mails, concerning the activities of the Anti-Saloon League in this their national headquarters; in short, gentlemen, they are now fighting amongst themselves, and when these reformers fall out I hope that the old adage will prove true and that the American people may come into their own. Oh, Mr. Speaker, some one has said that "None are so blind as those who will not see." Do not our professional reformers realize that they are going too far, or is it due to the fact that they wish to make the Volstead Act so drastic, so impossible of enforcement, that it will fall of its own weight, and then, perhaps, they can commence over and by so doing perpetuate themselves in office and continue to fool and bunko the great American public? I believe that lobbies of all kinds should be prohibited, or else surrounded with restrictions that would compel them to disclose the source from which they derive their money used to influence legislation. Petitions are not effective now, in competition with our powerful lobbies, with their high-priced trained lawyers and with their smooth, suave, slick, and smiling professional lobbyists. I hope to see the day when the petition method will be the only method outside of a direct appeal by the people, in person, used by the American people to impress their views on their representatives, and so I again repeat, "A plague on both your houses."

The Anti-Saloon League appears to be unusually active in the State of Wisconsin. They do not hesitate in their blind fanaticism to align themselves with big business or any other organization that they might be able to use. It is charged that they are in league with big business in Wisconsin. This may be true, but one thing is certain, they seem to be supplied with abundant funds for all their nefarious purposes. They have even invaded the sanctity of the judiciary, and I am informed that the head of that organization in Wisconsin is now under indictment for violation of the corrupt practice act. I am opposed to this bill, for I believe that beer brewed and aged under proper conditions, sold under proper Government regulations, would be a benefit to the people and to the Government. A tax of 5 cents a bottle on beer would produce an enormous revenue and provide a nutritious beverage in place of the many vile concoctions now consumed. My friend the gentleman from California, Mr. RAKER, quotes from a postal signed by "an ex-drunkard, who began on beer." Oh, that is an old stock argument, citing one instance, when I could cite thousands of instances of my own observation among my constituents who drank beer from early youth and who are still in the land of the living, enjoy the best of health, good, reliable citizens who would never think of taking a drink of whisky. But by depriving them of beer you are driving them to the strong liquor, to moonshine, and to poison, as well as creating in their hearts a hatred and disrespect for the law.

In this bill you have condemned and questioned the integrity of the medical profession, the noblest of all professions. It is, perhaps, true, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED], himself a physician, has so well said, "That a few high-brow physicians would deprive 150,000 reputable physicians of their traditional rights and stamp them as quacks and bootleggers." But this is all in line with the other activities of the Anti-Saloon League. This bill is, in my opinion, hypocritical to this extent—it provides that a doctor may prescribe strong liquor, 100 per cent proof, for a patient, and then you say he can not prescribe been containing 3 or 4 per cent alcohol for the same purpose. I can not follow that line of reasoning.

Mr. Speaker, I can not close without taking exception to the remarks made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GILBERT] relative to the German people. We have approximately 12,000,000 people of German descent in the United States, of which 1,000,000 reside in the State that I have the honor in part to represent. It is true that the German loves his beer, for it is a sort of a national beverage, and the true German drinks but very little whisky. It does not make him pot-bellied, as the gentleman from Kentucky said, neither does it make him an undesirable citizen. I am now talking about the true German, the German that left his home, left the fatherland, to escape the evils of Prussianism, who came here with the same ideals as your forefathers and mine; came here seeking a land of equal opportunity for all. That is the German I am talking about; that is the kind of a German that helped to make, by his industry, his sturdy independence, his thrift, and his self-reliance this great country what it is to-day. I am talking about the German that gave his all to his country, that gladly sent his sons across seas to help conquer the brutal Prussianized German, and to make the world "safe for democracy." I wish I had the time and the space to insert in the RECORD the real record of the German in the State of Wisconsin, the record of how they went over the top in all our Liberty loan campaigns. I may some day beg the indulgence of this House and insert in the RECORD the honor roll of the State of Wisconsin, which will show beyond a doubt that the German contributed his share, if not more than his share, toward winning the war.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I know the majority for this measure will be large. I know that if I had the profound knowledge of Webster, coupled with his eloquence, that I could not change a single vote. Your minds are made up. Put the finishing touches on this infamous piece of legislation known as the Volstead Act. Then pass legislation to stop smoking. Then interfere with the right of the American citizen to spend a part of the Sabbath in innocent amusement. Then regulate what we shall eat and wear. Oh, some of you may smile, but it is coming. Our blessed professional reformers must have something to do, something to keep them busy. You gentlemen will be asked to pass these measures, and if past performances are any criterion of the future, special rules will be again brought in here and will again be threatened with political oblivion unless you bow your heads in humble submission. But when you do, remember that the long-suffering, patient American citizen will some time voice a mighty protest, which protest will be a peaceful political revolution.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW].

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, first of all I want to emphasize the fact that the friends of the national prohibition amendment have never been in favor of any foolish interference with legitimate business. No such idea has been in the head of the far-seeing chairman of the committee. No such idea has been in the thought of Wayne B. Wheeler, that honest, clear-headed, patriotic man who has given a lifetime to this unselfish, valiant fight.

They have only been anxious that alcohol for legitimate industry should not be made the cloak for all kinds of devilish practices.

Let me here and now help to clear away the brush, if you please, concerning the report spread abroad by the liquor forces that Wayne B. Wheeler, the astute and trusted attorney for the Anti-Saloon League of America, draws a salary of $25,000 a year for his services as one of the trustees of the Anti-Saloon League. I happen to know that his salary is less than one-third of that amount. I happen to know that he recently turned down an offer of salary far, far larger than he is getting now because his comrades and his conscience forced him to remain at his post of duty—that duty that called him with compelling insistence when he was a boy of brilliant promise at Oberlin College 28 years ago, leading him into a life of sacrifice and service where his white plume, like Henry of Navarre, has waved on a thousand battle fields, where right has charged the citadels of wrong from the Atlantic to the Pacific. No wonder the liquor leaders traduce and malign him, for he has led the fight that put them out of business, and he is now our honored, trusted leader as we declare the debauching saloon shall never come back. [Applause.]

I want to say in the next place that I am in favor of the passage of this bill, because the failure to pass it would mean the reentrance of the German brewer into our economic robbery and our American political life, and that is something that good men do not desire and brave men, thank God, will not allow. [Applause.]

In the next place, I wish to reply to my genial friend from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] and emphasize the mistake in saying that this constitutional amendment loses its sacredness and its binding force because it represents the sentiment of only a part of the American people. I remind him and those who hold with him that this amendment has been added by ordinary constitutional process. I remind the Members of this House that all constitutional amendments that have been added since the birth of our Nation and the adoption of our Constitution have been put there as the expression of a part and not of all of the American people. The amendment concerning slavery, the amendment concerning equal suffrage, the amendment concerning prohibition, all express the thought of a part, indeed, a majority, of the American people.

PROHIBITION LAWS OF GOD AND MAN.

And let me say in reply to the many declarations that it is "dangerous to tell men they must not," that an argument of that kind would abrogate practically every law of God and man from Sinai down to Washington City.

I say it seriously and with grave concern. I think it is one of the saddest hours I have ever known for the youth of America, who constitute "the to-morrow of this Republic," to read from the floor of the American Congress the statements of leaders who have sworn at this sacred desk to stand by the Constitution of the United States and for the enforcement of the law, these defiant utterances against this bill, when almost every such utterance will encourage the breaking of this law all over America. [Applause.] And if this law, born in unselfish love for humanity's happiness and enacted as the result of the demand of the overwhelming majority of the people of this country—if this law is to be trampled with impunity—if its sacredness is to be scouted and its majesty flouted even by Members of the Congress that passed it, then I ask, in God's name, what is to become of the youth of America, and what is to become of the supremacy of the American flag at home, the respect for our flag abroad? The opponents of this bill are playing with both individual and national destiny.

WHAT IS IT THE GENTLEMEN WISH?

As I think of the attitude of the opponents of this remedial prohibition legislation, I find myself unable to forget the words of a certain brilliant and worthy patriot named Patrick Henry—words uttered at a time of a great crisis in our colonial life, and paraphrasing his words a little, let me ask, What is it the gentlemen wish? What would they have? Is political life so dear—are votes so sweet as to be purchased at the price of encouraging individual lawlessness and practical anarchy? Are the galleries at home so bacchanalian in their tastes, so defiant in their attitude, and so powerful in their influence that their applause must be won at the expense of the majesty of constitutional law and the debauchery of American youth?

What is it the gentlemen wish? What would they have? Do they stand out and out for the overthrow of the eighteenth amendment? Let me remind them of the necessary procedure? If that is what they really seek, they must secure a constitutional majority in both branches of Congress and then secure 36 States in the American Union to ratify the repeal of the national prohibition amendment. And that will occur just the day after Gabriel blows his trumpet and declares that time shall be no more. [Applause.]

A PIECE OF HOPELESS FOLLY.

I grant you that if enough "wet" men were elected as State legislators, Congressmen, governors, and Senators the law would be wiped out in a day. But we put you on notice that the friends of this law—the greatest moral triumph that any nation has ever known—do not intend to allow it. Thank God, they will not be found asleep at the switch! And inasmuch as your fight for repeal is absolutely hopeless, let me ask again: What is it the gentlemen wish? What would they have? Do they intend by personal and official example in the Halls of Congress to give aid and comfort to lawbreakers and liars all over America? Do they intend to join the former governors of New Jersey and Maryland, who led their own legislatures to pass a beverage act allowing 3½ per cent alcoholic content when our national law allowing only one-half of 1 per cent was overwhelmingly passed by this House?

Do they intend to unite their influence with that of the former governor of New York, who led the legislature of the Empire State of the Union to pass a 2.75 per cent license in defiance of the national law? Do they intend to take their place beside the Roman Catholic priest in Brooklyn, who a few months ago shook his fist at the American flag by urging his parishioners to trample under their feet this prohibition law, which interferes with their "personal liberties"? In short, do they intend to defiantly tell that benevolent old gentleman, "Uncle Sam," to come down from his high place of constituted, constitutional authority and go pell-mell to the place "where it does not snow"?

Let us get down to "brass tacks," whatever that means. Their opposition to an honest effort to strengthen our national prohibition law can have but one effect, and that is to help the cause of the lawbreaker everywhere. Is that what the gentlemen wish? Then these same gentlemen who ought to be standing like a stone wall in Congress and at home for the majesty of the law have their doubtful and dangerous reward.

If they take comfort in the retort of their erstwhile colleague who is now president of the Borough of Manhattan that we have "moonshine stills" in the mountains of Georgia and Kentucky, I remind them that these illicit dives of devilment are only the defiant expressions of the appetite begotten by the legalized liquor traffic; that we are making a valiant effort to put them out of business without any help or encouragement of the devotees of "wetness" on the floor of this House; but, after all, I remind you, as I reminded him, that I suppose it is not much more harmful for the Georgia mountaineer to make a "leetle" for home consumption than it is for the "wet" representatives of "wet" communities to make "moonshine" speeches here in Congress purely for "home consumption."

But frankly, my colleagues, the issue is too great for lightness of speech. To those who claim that the American workingman has a right to demand his beer I answer that the brave, sober workingmen of my section, thank God, do not want beer. They recognize the fact that beer can not be had without breweries, and breweries mean the corruption of our politics and the sodden debauchery of millions now living and countless millions yet unborn.

CHEAP OPPOSITION AND SOLEMN RESPONSIBILITY.

It is cheap, the cheapest kind of fruitless criticism for the opponents of this remedial legislation to answer with a taunt and a jeer that the weakness of the prohibition law is found in the fact that too many voters, too many in "high society," and even some Congressmen, "vote dry and drink wet" at Christmas times and other times. That charge gets nowhere. I love my colleagues. I honor my colleagues. But I do declare that in face of the fact that a majority of the people of the United States voted in their respective States and communities to outlaw this devilish thing, in face of the fact that both branches of Congress voted by constitutional majority to outlaw this devilish thing, in face of the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States handed down the high decision ratifying the outlawing of this devilish thing, any private citizen or any Member of Congress who will buy blind-tiger liquor with which to celebrate the birthday of Jesus Christ, or who will connive with any bootlegger to trample the laws of God and man, is a reproach to the church to which he or she belongs; that citizen is a reproach to the flag that has been made "stainless flag"; that citizen is a menace to sobriety and clean government and a travesty on patriotism; that citizen is a poor example for his own children and a dangerous leader for the young manhood of America. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, it has been said with much emphasis by supporters of this measure that they have heard no arguments with which they have not been made familiar during the discussions of the Volstead Act. I do not think they have contributed many new arguments themselves, unless it be the one advanced by my friend from California, Judge RAKER, who struck the rather novel method of producing an anonymous communication containing a preposterous statement, and then attributing it to opponents of this bill as the argument they have advanced upon this floor.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. COCKRAN. I will not. I have not the time. If you will get me a little time at the end, I will gladly yield for all questions that gentlemen wish to ask; but I must entreat gentlemen to let me finish what I have to say now in my own way, because my time is very brief—utterly insufficient to let me make clear the very momentous character of this proposal from the aspect that I hope I can place, though inadequately, before this House.

This is not a measure to enforce the prohibition act. It is a measure to prohibit medical science from exercising in full measure its beneficent influence. It aims to circumscribe the possibilities of remedial agencies for remedying the ills that beset humanity. It represents in the highest degree the measure to which intolerance can go when it is reinforced by a pretense of moral justification.

Mr. Speaker, in this proposal we are brought face to face with the oldest tendency that at recurring intervals has wrecked free governments. The very essence of this Government, the very essence of liberty, is that in matters of personal morals the State has no right to invade the domain of conscience.

If the State Government can prohibit the remedies medical science would prescribe to remedy human weakness and human suffering, then there is nothing it may not prohibit. It may forbid the use of tobacco, of tea, or coffee—even of milk. From prohibitive to command, the step is short and easily accomplished. If it can forbid certain articles it can commend others. If the State can tell me what is best for myself and my family, then, as one gentleman said, it can prescribe my daily attendance at church, it can prescribe morning and evening prayer, and specify the length of it. To do all these would not be half as extravagant as what they have attempted here. It is true that in this measure the Government aims to improve morals—and by improving them elevate conditions—but that is precisely its dangerous feature.

I want to call attention of gentlemen to this historical fact: Never yet have tyranny and prosecution been started to make men bad. It has always had its origin in misdirected and misjudged attempts to make them good. Why were men burned at the stake, why were over 70,000 men and women burned at Smithfield during the reign of Henry VIII? What was the reason assigned for this butchery by its author? Why, to save their souls from the perversity of their bodies. [Laughter.] And when some professed themselves ready to recant and conform to the religion the sovereign had established they were killed anyhow, lest they might once more relapse into infidelity; that is to say, into disbelief of the religion which the sovereign considered the only one consistent with the truths of Revelations. If, then, we allow the Government to decide for us what morality requires and enforce its decision with the club of the policeman, we open wide the door through which tyranny and persecution have always entered.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has stated that this legislation has resulted in an improved condition of morals, in turning the dull eye of drunken despondency into the brilliant eye of hopeful anticipation and the staggering gait into a manly tread. I think I am quoting him correctly. I answer him that instead of having restricted intoxication this prohibition has by the judgment of persons best qualified to know increased it.

This widespread growth of intemperance since the Volstead Act was passed justifies the statement made here by several gentlemen on the floor that it is absolutely impossible to enforce morality with a club. The vehement gentleman who just vacated the floor stated that because some of us object to the multiplication of prohibitions against the free actions of citizens, therefore we are in revolt against the law of man and the law of God. We recognize that certain prohibitions are essential to the welfare, indeed, to the safety of all society. But it has all been a fundamental principle of American constitutionalism that the Government which we conceive to be best, that system which we hold to be the soundest, is the one where prohibitions are the least in number. Mr. Speaker, if this attempt to establish morality by penal statute should succeed, then this Government must be subverted. A better one may replace it, but it must be a different one.

There is one feature of this Government wherein it differs from all others. It is fundamental and rests on a certain conception of humanity which underlies no other political system. It acknowledges that man is depraved naturally to some extent, but while he is capable of sinking into depravity unspeakable, so also is he capable of improvement immeasurable—improvement so vast that the Creator himself could come on earth and assume human nature—not the semblance of it, but the substance of it—without suffering any injury or abasement to His divinity.

This Government is founded on the belief that the American people embody the very highest moral excellence, and therefore that they are the fittest depository of power which ever has been found on this earth.

The corner stone of our political system is this belief—that power intrusted to the people will always be exercised to maintain morals and enforce justice. Our laws can never be the source, but always the product, of popular morality. If public opinion does not sanction, nay, if it does not demand enactment of any law, then, though passed a hundred times by Congress, it will remain a dead letter on the statute book.

This measure is founded in deepest distrust of the whole American people, on a belief that without the restraining club of the policeman they will sink into the worst depravities of intemperance.

If this belief be justified, then no law of this character can possibly be enforced. Without public opinion, as one gentleman supporting this measure said here, no law is of any force or vigor whatever. Placing it on the statute books gives it no life. That merely makes it a fountain of disorder, of blackmail, of corruption.

The late James C. Carter, who, I think, it was universally admitted was the greatest constitutional lawyer who appeared in this country since John Marshall adorned the bench, devoted the closing years of his life to preparation of a series of lectures on the fundamentals and essentials of law.

Those lectures he intended to deliver at Harvard University, but death intervened and prevented accomplishment of that purpose. However, they were fully completed. The substance and purpose of them all was to show that all law is merely custom. No law, he insisted, had any force unless it embodied a custom created by the daily doings of men in their ordinary avocations. What we call a statute is merely the determination of a political society to enforce upon a recalcitrant minority obedience to a custom already established by the majority. The instances that he gave to vindicate his thesis were, first, the absolute failure of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to secure the right of suffrage to the Negroes in the Southern States. These amendments were supported vigorously by the Federal and the State Governments, by the Army and the Navy, by the Supreme Court, and a powerful newspaper press. Yet they failed. They are to-day dead letters because the public opinion of those States regarded enforcement of them as incompatible with civilized conditions. And it is a fact to-day, of which southern men may well be proud, that they violated these constitutional amendments and excluded human beings who were unfit for the suffrage from the exercise of it, and by that act raised Negroes in the South to a degree of prosperity they do not approach in any Northern State. In the North we allow them to vote, but we do not let them work.

In the South they are not allowed to vote, but they are allowed to work. And, thank heaven, the Negro, reduced to a choice between living where he could vote and living where he could work, has elected for work. He has quadrupled in the South. He is acquiring property there and attaining a position that could not have been anticipated or even conceived a few years ago. That impressive result was achieved through resolute and persistent violation of two constitutional provisions, of the civil rights act, of all the laws that were passed during that period of reconstruction, nullification of which was the salvation of the South and, I think, a tremendous contribution to the welfare of the whole country. Yet gentlemen from the South are vehement now in declaring that because this is a constitutional amendment it must be observed.

The other instance that Mr. Carter was wont to give in support of his view was the failure in New York City of laws somewhat similar to this enacted by the State legislature. The liquor laws were never enforced in New York City. Local administrations came into power pledged to enforce them, determined to enforce them, and every one ended in failure. Why? Because, as Mr. Carter well described it, these legislative acts were all attempts to impose the customs of Chautauqua County on Manhattan Island. There would have been no necessity for coercive measures to enforce these laws in Chautauqua County. There public opinion approved them, but they could not be enforced in New York City because there public opinion condemned them.

It is really useless to discuss or consider whether that public opinion is good or bad, sound or unsound. It is the opinion of the locality, and that being the case you can not enforce a law in violation of that opinion. You can not get juries to convict persons accused of violating it. And though you may get officers willing to prosecute them, those prosecuted will always result, as the able gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] said, in a hand stretched out behind the back for the secret, sordid argument of corruption to induce aversion of the official head when violations occur and in withholding the hand of violated law from the shoulder of the offender.

It has been the untold experience of society that whenever laws of this kind are passed they lead to an unlawful and unwholesome system of licensing violations of them, the proceeds of which licensing do not find their way into the Public Treasury but into the pockets of officers as the tribute of corruption.

Mr. Speaker, in the light of all this experience it must be clear it is utterly impossible to enforce in any locality a law that is against the opinion of that locality. This particular law may be enforced in other localities. But it can not be enforced in New York. And there is one reason which makes it doubly impossible to be enforced. This law invades the domain of medical relief. Think of it, sir! A gentleman here has said that there is no such thing in the Pharmacopœia as a prescription of alcohol or beer. Of course there is not. They do not belong to the domain of prescriptions.

Prescriptions are cabalistic figures, comprehendible only by druggists, which result in certain compounds or drugs that are believed to have remedial effect. But as one gentleman supporting this bill said here to-day, the tendency of medical progress now is to avoid prescriptions, or drugs, and fall back upon the regulation of food. It has become an axiom of modern science that men frequently dig their graves with their teeth. Indeed, it claims that more graves are dug with teeth than with spades. It is the improvident use of food with which physicians now concern themselves. One recommendation made by many doctors—and every doctor here on the floor has testified to it from both sides of the House—is the use of beer and ale in moderate quantities to meet certain physical conditions. This would not be a prescription but advice for regulation of food. And now you step in to prevent this. And, pray, who are you? I ask gentlemen not for a moment to think that I am belittling them. But I say that by comparison with the learned men who advise use of beer or ale in certain cases, you are ignoramuses on the subject, and yet you, ignorant of medical science, proceed on some testimony collected here and there from nameless witnesses, against the whole body of scientific opinion, and say that no matter what science may judge essential to the welfare of humanity, forbid—prohibit—the attempts of medical skill to reduce the miseries of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I am not now saying anything about the original Volstead Act. That is here, and I have no doubt in the world that, some way or other, it and the eighteenth amendment will be made ultimately to conform with the opinion and sense of right in each locality, as those two amendments affecting Negro suffrage have been made to confirm the supremacy of the white race in the Southern States. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES].

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I have not heard a voice here to-day from Illinois except on the other side, and I want to say that the State of Illinois is for the passage of this bill. As far as I am concerned, I do not agree with the gentleman who said a minute ago that "he voted against the original bill and was glad he did it." I want it understood, Mr. Speaker, that I came down here two years ago with 140,000 majority and voted roll call after roll call for this thing and every voter in the State of Illinois knew it and they sent me back here with 799,000 majority. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the whole argument against this measure is based upon three erroneous assumptions: First, that it can not be enforced, as, especially in the State of New York, citizens generally will violate it; second, the poor workingman thereby will be deprived of his beer; and, third, the American Federation of Labor, from its convention in Denver, Colo., has demanded beer and light wines, and that, forsooth, it will be dangerous to Congressmen in future elections to now disobey its mandate.

Mr. Speaker, it is incumbent upon our President's administration to enforce the law of this land, constitutional and statutory. If our President's administration does its duty—and I believe that it will—it is going to strictly enforce the prohibition laws throughout the United States, even in the so-called outlaw State of New York; and if they continue to violate it there, as was asserted by our friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN] is generally done there, some of his law-ignoring, beer-drinking constituents there are going to land in the Federal penitentiary unless they reform. It is "Uncle Sam's" law they are going to violate. It is a jury in a Federal court they are going to face, before a Federal judge, and be prosecuted by a Federal district attorney, all of whom are not like our distinguished young friend from Maryland [Mr. HILL]. And ultimately these law breakers are going to ascertain to their sorrow that there is no "monkey business" in Federal courts where our laws have been ruthlessly violated. And if you good Republican brothers of ours under your administration of public affairs can not enforce the laws then the people will put somebody in your places with different administrative policies.

Even should this bill fail of passage, it is not going to be the poor workingmen who get these beer prescriptions in New York. They will all be gobbled up by the rich millionaires in that metropolis, who will be at the head of the line and take them faster than the New York physicians can issue them. This bill is for the millionaire beer drinkers of New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. Their supply is already in.

Mr. BLANTON. Our New York colleagues who are so active to-day are speaking for their millionaire beer-drinking constituents and not for the poor workingmen, concerning whom they seem to be so solicitous.

Prescriptions for beer as medicine will cost money, and doctors charge rich men more for prescriptions than they do workingmen. And doctors are limited in the number of prescriptions they may issue for liquor. Hence will they not be tempted to issue all such prescriptions up to their limit to rich men, and not issue any to the poor workingman? Because they know that beer is not a medicine, and that really the man will be better off without it, hence they will ease their conscience with the thought that after all they have not denied the poor workingman any medical relief, which under all other circumstances all doctors so readily and generously accord.

This subject has ceased to be a question of pro and anti, but has become a question of obedience to or disobeyance of law. It is a question of upholding the fundamental law of the land. Are you going to uphold the Constitution or turn it down?

Mr. TINKHAM. What about the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. It is all right. I uphold it as well as every other part of the Constitution upon which our Government is founded.

But, Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], in spite of all of whose faults we all love still made a sham battle upon the proposed Volstead bill, a rule for which he denied, and made a pretense that its passage would have been impossible. He knows better than anyone else that he could have reported a rule out of his committee, making it in order just as it was without amendment, and could have limited the debate on it to one hour, or to any other specified time he saw fit, and provided for the ordering of the previous question at the end of such debate, and could have had a decisive vote on it to-day, long before this time had he so desired, but he did not so desire. He would give no such rule for the Volstead bill. But he himself took therefrom two sections and introduced the same in the House as his own bill, and gave the Judiciary Committee to understand that they could take that or nothing. But he is not fooling anybody. All of the prohibitionists of the United States fully understand the situation, and his modus operandi. And in a similar way he killed the anti-sedition bill, at the instance of Samuel Gompers, when radicals were daily preaching revolution and the overthrow of our Government and when 85 per cent of the good people of the United States wanted it passed.

Are you under obligations to obey the mandate of Mr. Samuel Gompers and the American Federation of Labor on this question? I am not. He has ordered his men to disregard the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States, when it did not suit them. He said at Denver the other day that he was not willing to trust this Government with the destiny of laborers. I differ with him fundamentally.

Mr. CLASSON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I would not be doing my duty to my country or to labor if I did not reply to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]. Mr. COOPER calls the attention of Congress to the vote of the American Federation of Labor on this question and says that the American Federation of Labor does not speak for labor. If the delegates elected to and attending the convention of the American Federation of Labor do not speak for and represent labor, then the Members elected to this Congress do not speak for or represent the people of this country. The delegates to the convention are elected by the votes of their membership and go to that convention to carry out the will and instructions of the class of labor they represent. Members of Congress are elected by the votes of their constituents and are sent here to carry out their pledges and obey the wishes and desires of the people. If the American Federation of Labor had gone on record in favor of this amendment, it would have taken a couple of you gentlemen to hold the Representative from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in his seat, his joy would have been so great.

And my good friend from Illinois [Mr. YATES] called your attention to the splendid vote he received after voting for the Volstead Act. Well, in answer to that I will say I voted against the Volstead Act, and the people of Pennsylvania returned me to Congress with a greater majority vote than before.

When the Volstead Act was first up I pleaded then for beer and light wines for the working people of the country, and I stated to the chairman of the committee that if he would amend the bill and let the working people of the country have their light beer and wines, the prohibition question would be settled for years to come; and if not, it would be an issue in every campaign, and I think my prediction is true, and I believe the issue was very much in evidence in Chairman VOLSTEAD'S own district and in his campaign.

This question must be settled right. The working people of this country want their beer and light wines, and their request should be acceded to. Prohibitive laws—restrictive laws which encroach upon personal liberty and the constitutional rights of the American people—are not wise or just laws. They only serve to breed contempt of law and make lawbreakers out of law-abiding citizens. The wisest and best thing for this Congress to do is to enact sane legislation, honest legislation, and progressive legislation in the interest of the country and the American people. There is much need of it at this time and in this critical period of our country's history, but there is no need and no necessity for legislation which tampers with the personal rights of the American people—the rights which are guaranteed them by the Constitution of the United States.

The American working people are opposed to this amendment, and I hope it will be voted down. It is too drastic to be fair, and any legislation which is not enacted in the spirit of justice and fairness to all is not a workable law and can not survive.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLASSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the problem of national prohibition to-day is the same as it was before the adoption of the constitutional amendment. It is one of enforcement. It was never a question that prohibition could be enforced in communities where the sentiment was overwhelmingly in favor of the law, but the problem when the constitutional amendment was up for consideration was whether you could compel an unwilling constituency to observe a rule of living which was counter to that which they believed was proper and right and was not within the province of legislative domain. Since Congress made its attempt to enforce national prohibition we find, in communities where the majority sentiment was opposed to prohibition, an increasing disrespect for the law. Instead of conditions improving, the fact is they are getting worse.

Many are the instances where persons who prior to the adoption of the national prohibition act were only given to taking a wholesome glass of beer are now given to drinking whisky. Go to New York, to Chicago, to any of our large cities, and you will see instances of persons who never before had drank whisky who are now given over to drinking it ad libitum. The problem to-day before the House is whether you are going to make the enforcement law ridiculous or seek to establish a reasonable provision so as to make it enforceable.

I care not how blatant the prohibitionist may be, he certainly does not wish this unbridled practice of whisky drinking to spread. The country, as I sound public opinion, is opposed to whisky but favor light wines and beer. And yet by this measure you legalize whisky drinking and penalize beer drinking.

If whisky and strong wines, with their strong alcoholic content, have a medicinal value, as this bill acknowledges, certainly beer, with its lighter alcoholic content, has a proportional medicinal value, and, further, it has sedative and laxative qualities wanting in whisky.

Instead of striving to ban whisky and its concoctions, you surrender to the whisky proprietary medicine interests and permit them to manufacture and druggists to sell whisky under camouflage names. Instead of Congress seeking by legislation to restrict the use of whisky, you recognize it by this bill, but restrict the medical profession in prescribing beer, with its long-time recognized health-giving qualities.

Farmers are not specially opposed to this legislation, because they can have their private stills and make their own whisky and have their homemade wines. The people of Ohio and the people of Kansas, seemingly, by the voice of their Representatives here, are in favor of this legislation, because they do not need prescriptions to get their medicated whiskies in the form of patent medicines; but when it comes to the question of allowing the toilers in the industrial centers to have their mild stimulant in a glass of beer, to allow nursing mothers a mild, harmless beverage to sustain them, those on the other side—and three have risen on the Democratic side—throw sneers at the Germans because they happen to have a desire to drink that which has been health giving to them. But there are more people in this country than those of German ancestry who wish to have the privilege to drink beer and light wines given to them. The growing demand to have this privilege restored is not confined to any nationality or to any class. The demand is general—country wide—and will not down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two and one-half minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. APPLEBY].

Mr. APPLEBY. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I want to correct an impression that New Jersey is entirely wet, as two of my colleagues have spoken against this amendment.

I want to say a few words in favor of this amendment, especially representing the womanhood and the youth of my district, who have been benefited by the results already obtained by the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. What they want and the average voter asks is a fair enforcement of this law as other laws are enforced. What has been lacking has been but a partial enforcement of the law in question. As a former mayor of one of the large coast cities I found more difficulty in stopping the sale of beer than whisky.

No arguments presented here to-day have convinced me that beer is not intoxicating.

Let us adopt this amendment and give this law a fair trial. I thank you for your courteous attention. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, during this debate it has been frequently intimated that there is a strong organized propaganda to bring about the defeat of this proposed bill. These charges to prejudice the minds of the Members can not be substantiated, as they are without foundation whatever, but it can not be successfully denied by anyone that there is an organized movement on the part of the Anti-Saloon League, aided and assisted by two or three of the largest brewers, who are endeavoring to eliminate the smaller brewers who are manufacturing a much better near beer than they, but who, unfortunately, are not in position to expend tremendous sums in advertising their product as do these few large brewers. This proposed legislation is also favored by some of the large distillers who, notwithstanding the fact that they have disposed of most of their stocks, still hold large quantities of stocks of others and being the only ones authorized to bottle in bond are holding up the owners, and the wholesale and retail druggists, by charging them for bottling at the rate of $3 a gallon, or $9 or $10 for a case of 12 bottles.

Mr. Speaker, the opposition to this bill comes from the great majority of the medical profession and from the continuously increasing number of American citizens who are opposed to sumptuary legislation which deprives an honored profession from its rights and people of their liberty. Notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], I maintain the people have not had ample time or opportunity to be heard against this measure. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], in his usual clever way, endeavors to minimize the action of the American Federation of Labor at its recent Denver convention, charged the adoption of the resolutions favoring the return of light wines and beer to the world's greatest labor leader, Mr. Samuel Gompers. The gentleman further states that he is not ready to follow him and that the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled does not represent American labor.

In answer to that statement let me ask the gentleman if the convention of the delegates of the American Federation of Labor, representing directly 5,000,000 and indirectly 15,000,000 more American laboring men and women, does not speak for the American laboring people, who does? Mr. Speaker, that convention by a nearly unanimous vote again has gone on record—not for the saloon as some gentlemen charge, but for personal liberty and for civil rights and the humanizing of the Volstead Act. So there may be no misunderstanding as to the action taken by the convention, I insert an extract from the proceedings, giving the resolution adopted:

Whereas great dissatisfaction is manifested throughout our country among all classes against the Volstead enforcement law; and

Whereas many of our people were of the impression that with the adoption of the eighteenth amendment it would not exclude the Nation's national beverage, that of wholesome beer; and

Whereas the drastic Volstead law has brought about the wholesale illicit manufacture of whisky and other strong alcoholic liquors or concoctions, which has resulted in the deaths of hundreds of our citizens and has impaired the sight of thousands of others, due to the drinking of concoctions containing wood and denatured alcohol; and

Whereas this deplorable condition has made the Volstead enforcement law unpopular with the vast majority of our citizens: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor, in the forty-first annual convention, assembled in Denver, Colo., declare itself in favor of modification of the Volstead law so as to permit the manufacture and sale of a national beverage of wholesome beer; and be it further

Resolved, That the officers and executive council of the American Federation of Labor be, and are hereby, directed to do everything within their power to have the contents of this resolution carried into effect.

Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted to what extent the Anti-Saloon League and some Members on this floor will go and how intemperate they become when it comes to forcing the passage of this sumptuary and fanatical legislation. Some try to create prejudice by endeavoring to inject the belief and false impression by continuous insinuation against the German brewer. Such tactics, insinuations, and charges should be just as strongly condemned as the action on the part of some of the southern and northern Members who still do not know that the Civil War is over, and for their benefit I desire to read the views expressed by Thomas Jefferson on that very question in his letter of introduction to Col. Charles Yancey of one Capt. Miller.

Thomas Jefferson, on January 6, 1816, addressed a communication to Col. Charles Yancey containing the following statement:

There is before the assembly a petition of a Capt. Miller which I have at heart, because I have great esteem for the petitioner as an honest and useful man. He is about to settle in our country and to establish a brewery, in which art I think him as skillful a man as has ever come to America. I wish to see this beverage become common, instead of the whisky, which kills one-third of our citizens and ruins their families. He is staying with me until he can fix himself, and I should be thankful for information from time to time of the progress of his petition.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that there are some Members so blinded with prejudice that they will make use of the most ridiculous pieces of literature, as has been done by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], who endeavored to make the House believe that he was reading from a card received from an ex-drunkard, when a blind man could have known that it was an anonymous card mailed from Washington to every Member and originated by the Anti-Saloon League. Time does not permit me to read it, but for the purpose of showing to what extent the prohibition fanatics will go I insert it in my remarks:

A DREAM.

Two couples were standing in the spirit world viewing the actions of their children in this world. My wife and I saw our boy staggering through the streets. Our agony was intensified by an angel who said, "Had you done your duty this would not have been." I had lived a drunken life until almost ready for the grave, and she was in favor of and kept "beer and light wines" for daily temperate consumption.

My companion and wife, a man and woman who had never drank anything intoxicating, but who had upheld the rights of others to do so—the man a Member of Congress, his wife a social leader, gazed on the little daughter whom they had left below in a drunkard's home, surrounded by poverty and misery.

As before, the angel said: "Had you done your duty when an inhabitant of the world this would not have been." "But I never did any of these things." "True, but your influence was never exerted against them and you are as guilty, if not more so, than your friend."

Moral: Fight "beer and light wines" and all officials who favor them as you would a rattlesnake, for, as has been well said, "It is a notorious fact that nearly all drunkards begin by drinking 'light wines and beer' when young, and as the appetite grows, the desire for stronger drink is developed." (An ex-drunkard who began on beer.)

It is charged by some of the proponents of this legislation that the medical profession does not believe in prescribing beer and wine. I have in my possession a communication received only this morning, showing that a poll has been taken in the State of Illinois and that nearly 80 per cent of the physicians have gone on record declaring themselves as opposed to this and similar legislation and against restricting them in prescribing what they believe is most beneficial to their patients. The gentleman from New York, Dr. KINDRED, who addressed the House a little while ago, and who is one of the leading physicians of New York City, with 30 years of honorable practice, has clearly demonstrated that in many instances wine and beer possess not only food and strength but medicinal values and is prescribed by the highest and most reputable members of the medical profession.

Mr. Speaker, to show the fallacy of the arguments of two of the Members from Ohio, who stated they were in receipt of petitions from their respective congressional districts signed by 50 physicians who are opposed to prescribing wine or beer, I wish to insert extracts from an article appearing in the June issue of the Illinois Medical Journal, which quotes statistics from the Medical Pocket Quarterly, Jersey City, N. J., showing the result of a referendum of 25,000 votes cast, Of this number 20,176 physicians were against any legislation proposing to change the provisions of the Volstead Act prohibiting the prescribing of wine and beer, while only 1,935 were in favor of further governmental regulation. This, to my mind, shows conclusively the stand of this high profession against Government interference in their prerogative of prescribing whatever they believe proper. The extract from the Illinois Medical Journal is as follows:

A referendum vote taken on this question by the Medical Pocket Quarterly (Jersey City, N. J.) to establish the sentiment of the profession on the question showed 20,176 votes against the surrender of this privilege to the Government and 1,935 in favor of surrender, while 1,134 failed to vote. The total vote cast is claimed by the Quarterly to be "the largest, most nation-wide, and most representative vote ever cast by the physicians of this country on any single subject," and shows a significant solidarity of sentiment. We read:

"Physicians of every State in the Union voted in this referendum, including practitioners in all the States of the South and West which were running on a prohibition basis before the enactment of the eighteenth amendment. Country as well as city physicians participated in equal amount, the vote as a whole epitomizing clearly the unwillingness of the medical profession to relinquish the prerogative they enjoy, even if they all do not exercise it, for personal or other reasons."

I also wish to insert a statement by Dr. Charles J. Whalen, editor of the Illinois Medical Journal, and also a communication which I have just received from Dr. H. Preston Pratt, secretary of the Legislative Medical Committee, of Chicago, Ill.

Dr. Charles J. Whalen, editor of the Illinois Medical Journal, says:

The attempt by legislative enactment to say how a doctor shall practice medicine and what he shall charge for his services is an unwarranted restriction upon the freedom of his practice. If you put a limitation on the price he shall charge for liquor as medicine, you can also put a price on his charge for digitalis, or an operation, or even what a lawyer shall charge for a divorce case. If this proposed law is adopted, what is to prevent the legislature limiting the fee in an obstetric case to $1.88? I claim the right to prescribe for a patient anything I may see fit, and my reputation as a physician depends upon the judgment with which I exercise this right.

LEGISLATIVE MEDICAL COMMITTEE,
Chicago, June 25, 1921.

Hon. A. J. SABATH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FELLOW CITIZEN: We take this means of directing the attention of you and your fellow Members of Congress to a phase of the existing and contemplated so-called prohibition laws, enactments, provisions, and suggestions in the belief that it will give a broader and, if the term is permissible, more comprehensive view of the entire situation.

Through agitation, misunderstanding, and misrepresentation the medical profession, 95 per cent honorable, skilled, responsible, schooled by teaching and experience, is under indictment as a potential and actual lawbreaker; rated, held, and classified practically in the same category as gun toters or bootleggers.

This is a serious and monstrous error, which careful analysis will prove. The responsibilities, obligations, duty, and practice of the trained, matriculated, and licensed physician place him as administering to and a servant of humanity; by his knowledge, judgment, and experience employing the best methods, agents, and materials for the alleviation and cure of human ills.

In the premises his very existence is at stake, being juggled about at the mercy of certain whims and foibles that are fundamentally dangerous and unsound. Wines and alcoholic malt beverages have been employed as among the most valuable props of medical practice for more than a hundred years, for their essential therapeutic and food value and strength. In the best judgment of the medical profession, as vehemently voiced and expressed by individual members, these forms of medicine and food should continue to be available in the practice of medicine.

The physician of the United States is not a lawbreaker, potential or actual; he is not an opponent of any measure for the protection and guidance of the greater number; he is not seeking any class legislation or special privilege. He has observed the fearful increase of diabetes and diabetic conditions in the Nation. He has noted with apprehension the infringement by legal act of rights and duties that are paramount in properly adjusted civilization and standard of living. He does, and memorializes you and your honorable fellow Members of Congress against the enactment of laws and establishment of provisions that strike at the very foundation of medical practice, the use and application of the proper medicinal and food materials, in their recognized forms and uses.

Out of a recent crystallized sentiment of the physicians of the State of Illinois grows the national organization of individual and collective protest, as represented by the undersigned at this time. It is a noteworthy fact that about 80 per cent of the physicians of Illinois filed their written and definite protests against measures pending in the Illinois General Assembly at that time, setting up similar restrictions and limitations as hereinbefore described. A leading medical authority insisted that 95 per cent of the individual members of the medical profession of the United States, not as organizations or societies, would give similar expression. The protests of the individual physicians of Illinois are signed documents not for publication but subject to review and corroboration.

Recognizing the lateness of the hour for such action, it is hoped and prayed that no decisive action be taken by Congress before reasonable opportunity is given for securing and submitting the individual expression of the physicians of the United States, a quick process and a voice that should be heard.

Are we to become a Nation of diabetics because of prohibition? Are we to subject ourselves to the medical practice of legislators and laymen? To what institution or medium shall we turn for the relief of our ills and ailments if the fundamental principles and responsibilities of the medical profession and practice are shackled and practically destroyed?

Your counsel, aid, and cooperation are urgently sought in this all-important time and premise.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. PRESTON PRATT, M. D., Secretary.

I also wish to insert as part of my remarks an article signed by nine of the most prominent physicians of New York City, appearing in the Medical Journal of June 4 of this year, page 1593:

It should be pointed out that the Volstead Act contains the most drastic legislation affecting the medical profession yet enacted. A physician becomes a criminal by the mere fact of writing a prescription for more than a pint of whisky for one patient within 10 days, and, so far as the revocation of his permit is concerned, is denied his constitutional right of trial by jury. (This interpretation of the law is supported by competent legal opinion.) The law states that "After a permit has been revoked by the commissioner the permittee may have a review of the decision before a court of equity. During the pendency of such action such permit may be temporarily revoked."

The precedent established by the Volstead Act in restricting medical practice should, if physicians value their therapeutic liberty, be met with a protest which will command attention. To-day it is alcohol, to-morrow it may be any remedy which falls under the ban.

We would suggest that the physicians of the country write to their Senators and Representatives in Congress in terms which leave no doubt with respect to their attitude concerning the regulation of therapeutic procedure by statute.

An article appearing in the Washington Post gives an account of an interview with the former head of the legal division of the prohibition department, Mr. Alfred D. Van Buren, who, better than any other man, is familiar with the effect this legislation has upon the country. I can not help but feel that it has escaped the attention of a large number of Members who need positive and real enlightenment on this vital question, and I therefore avail myself of the privilege of incorporating it as part of my remarks.

CALLS FOR SANITY IN PROHIBITION LAW—NATION DRIFTING TO DRY ANARCHY, SAYS A. VAN BUREN AS HE RESIGNS ENFORCEMENT POST—LEGITIMATE BUSINESS HURT—RESPECT FOR LIQUOR ACT CAN NOT BE ENGENDERED BY RUTHLESS RESTRICTIONS, HE ASSERTS.

Warning that the entire prohibition situation may be thrown open to "judicial intervention and review" unless saner methods displace the constant cries from extreme drys for more severe enactments by Congress was given to-night by Alfred D. Van Buren, formally announcing his resignation as chief counsel to the Federal prohibition commissioner.

"The country is drifting toward prohibition anarchy," said Mr. Van Buren. "Unless calm and sane judgment displaces popular excitement and hysteria, the respect for the law, so essential to enforcement, will be lost, and the entire situation will be thrown open to judicial intervention and review."

* * * * * * *

PEOPLE ARE INDIGNANT.

Stating that while there can be no doubt that when the amendment was adopted the people intended to prohibit for all time intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, Mr. Van Buren said:

"There is reason to doubt that the people intended, or at least fully understood, that the measure for its enforcement would be carried to the extremes which Congress deemed necessary to include in the national prohibition act.

"Consequently, when the people realized—and they are just beginning to realize—that the practice of medicine, pharmacy, chemistry, and even religion, is affected, surprise and consternation has prevailed, which in many sections has given way to resentment and indignation."

Mr. Speaker, in reply to those who fear that people may obtain beer for beverage purposes, I say how much better it would be to obtain it in a legitimate way than by illegal means. I feel confident that if 3 per cent beer were permitted that the thousands upon thousands of stills in every State of the Union would not increase but diminish within a very short period, and thereby millions of our otherwise law-abiding citizens would not be forced to become violators and transgressors of the law. It is for that reason that I include as part of my remarks several newspaper articles touching on various phases of the question which I hope will strike home to those who have been swayed by prejudice and unreliable reports in legislating on this all-important subject:

BLAMES CRIME ON PROHIBITION—EFFORTS TO ENFORCE DRY ACT ALSO RESPONSIBLE FOR LAWLESSNESS, SAYS GOV. CORNWELL.

[By the Associated Press.]

HUNTINGTON, W. VA., February 21.

Gov. John J. Cornwell to-night, in an address before the Men's Service Chapter of the Trinity Episcopal Church, declared it as his belief that the prevalence of crime in the United States is due primarily to national prohibition and attempts to enforce the Volstead Act.

"There is more crime in the United States now than ever before in her history," he said. "This is due to our national prohibition laws and attempts at their enforcement, and much of our crime is due to violations of these laws. The number of violations of these laws is astonishing, and the number of arrests, as well as the number of flagrant cases in which there are no arrests, is astounding.

"Men have not accustomed themselves to these new laws. When the quart a month law was effective I pardoned men by the hundreds. There were several reasons for this, chief of which was the jail census, which showed that there were 1,800 men in the jails of the State. Some business institutions were unable to operate on account of the number of their employees in jail.

"This condition had to be relieved. It is not possible to eliminate or to reduce crime by the pyramiding of penalties. The only way is through education and Christianization."

"DRUNKS TREBLED SINCE PROHIBITION," SAYS COURT.

NEW YORK, May 18.

Magistrate Geismar, in the Fifth Avenue court, Brooklyn, yesterday expressed surprise when nine men were arraigned before him charged with intoxication. The magistrate said:

"If you can afford to buy 'booze' you can afford a steep fine. I am tired of seeing so many drunkards. We used to get three or four drunks in this court on a Monday morning, but since the advent of prohibition the number has tripled."

The verdict does not alter Judge Chatfield's decision that raids may be legally made on saloons without search warrants.

DOCTORS PLEA FOR WINE AS LIFE SAVER.

Chicago physicians members of the American Protective Medical Fraternity yesterday appealed to Gov. Small to veto the bill recently passed by the State senate to forbid prescription of light wines and beer. The bill permits prescriptions for whisky and narcotics.

"Many lives have been saved by champagne," says the telegram signed by Dr. Eldorado W. Scott, secretary. "In many cases it has been invaluable for persons near death, whose stomachs are in such delicate condition they can take nothing else.

"Certain forms of beer are invaluable to nursing mothers and for insomnia cases. Sherry wine, with white of egg, has from time immemorial been considered beneficial."

"DRYS" POWERLESS IN NORTH CAROLINA—UNITED STATES AGENTS REPORT 100 PER CENT INCREASE IN ILLICIT DISTILLING—ASK MORE AID OF STATE—UNABLE TO TAKE CARE OF COMPLAINTS, SAYS FEDERAL CHIEF—RURAL DISTRICTS WORST.

[By Associated Press.]

RALEIGH, N. C., January 16.

Organization of a State constabulary to supplement the forces of the Federal prohibition agents and county officers in suppressing the widespread manufacture of liquor in North Carolina will be urged at the present session of the North Carolina General Assembly, it was learned to-day.

Federal authorities admit that the job has grown too big for the limited staff of 46 Federal agents now employed in this State.

Transmitting his annual report to R. S. Brame, supervising agent of the prohibition forces, H. G. Gulley, chief of the North Carolina division, declares that a conservative estimate would show an increase of 100 per cent in illicit distilling in the State during the past year.

CAPTURED 4,686 ILLICIT STILLS.

Illicit distilleries captured number 4,686 and the number of men and women arrested 2,317, two-thirds of the number being taken by Federal agents.

"We are not able to take care of the complaints that are made to our department," said Mr. Gulley. "The rural population of North Carolina is infested with violators of the prohibition laws and in some communities it is very serious."

During the past year 8,257 gallons of contraband liquor were seized by Federal agents and half that quantity by the sheriffs of the various counties. Federal agents seized and destroyed 13,405 fermenters, 21,953 gallons of apple cider, 4,450 gallons of molasses, 3,070 pounds of sugar, and 1,048,264 gallons of beer. Forty-six horses and 91 automobiles were seized and sold at public auction.

PENALTIES TOTALED $1,153,181.

The total value of the property seized and not destroyed was $65,047, and the value of property seized and destroyed was placed at $412,947.

Taxes and penalties assessed against violators of the law totaled $1,153,181, which does not include the penalties imposed by county authorities. The cost of administration in the State was less than $150,000, leaving the Federal Government a net profit of $1,074,238.

FINDS PROHIBITION MAKES UNITED STATES GLOOMY—DR. HELMER KEY, STOCKHOLM EDITOR, TELLS OF AMERICAN VISIT IN BOOK.

Here are a distinguished foreigner's two comments on prohibition in the United States:

It makes the American people dull and gloomy.

If you have the price, liquor is not hard to get.

Dr. Helmer Key, editor in chief of the influential Stockholm daily, the Svenska Dagbladet, passes these strictures after a personal tour of the United States. He has just published a book in Sweden, entitled "My Trip to America in 1920," which tells the Swedes a great deal about America. Translations made from this book in the office of the American minister, Ira Nelson Morris, in Stockholm, show that Dr. Key was not favorably impressed by the operation of the prohibition laws in America last year.

Here are extracts from the editor's observations:

HOW SOME PERSONS GET A DRINK.

"The most outstanding characteristic of the situation resulting from the prohibition law is a certain atmosphere of silent weariness, prevailing especially among the lower sections of the people. To the upper classes of society the liquor prohibition so far has brought but few inconveniences. In the leading hotels and restaurants no alcohol whatsoever is served, and even if spirits were served occasionally in some of the restaurants of New York, it is safe to say that the hotels did not dare to transgress the law.

"An attentive observer might, however, soon enough discover certain suspicious maneuvers at the tables around him in the restaurants, not a few brandy flasks of the most peculiar shapes being circulated, evidently containing whisky or similar liquors. The liquor prohibition has given rise to a new branch of goldsmith manufacture, namely, alcoholic reservoirs, for instance, in the form of cigarette cases, spectacle cases, opera-glass cases, and the like.

SAYS LIFE BECOMES DULL.

"One provision in the prohibition law is that it is forbidden to transport alcoholic goods even in one's own automobile; this, of course, being but an absolutely illusory provision. The control in regard to the observance of the law and the problems connected therewith can at first not be surveyed by an outsider. What an outsider can see, however, is that the moral effect of the law is not of a very favorable nature.

"The life especially of manual laborers, who could not afford to lay up supplies, is very dull. If you visit, as I did, for instance, one of the sailors' homes in the harbor of Philadelphia, you will be struck by the immense gloom pervading the place, dreary in itself, where the bored men hang over a filthy billiard table or over a game of dominoes, without the slightest prospect of stimulus.

"Very few people had imagined that ale and lighter wines would be placed under prohibition nor that prohibition would prove of so long duration. The discontent, accordingly, is now the greater. I have talked with many men and women, and nearly all have expressed dissatisfaction even though admitting that the prohibition may prove beneficial to the people as a whole.

* * * * * * *

DR. KEY FINDS PRIVATE STILLS.

"Private preparation of spirits and ale is very common. In Washington and also in many other places it is declared that there is not a kitchen but has its own distillation apparatus for the preparation of whisky or other liquors. The whisky thus manufactured is humorously called 'moonshine whisky.'"

DRY ERA A CURSE TO MAN AND NATION; END IT, DOCTORS DEMAND.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., June 27, 1921.

The doctors of the country were called upon to-day to unite in an effort to repeal the Volstead Act by Dr. W. Wallace Fritz, of Philadelphia, president of the Allied Medical Association of America, in an address at the annual convention of the organization.

"The precedent established by the Volstead Act," he said, "restricts medical practice, and the profession should not permit itself to be placed in a position as liquor salesmen and drug stores as saloons.

"The question is frequently asked, What benefit, if any, has the public derived from the enactment of the prohibition law?

"From general observation it has been a curse to them and to our country. It has taken away pure liquor and beer and has substituted poison and deleterious liquors and beer.

"It is teaching the public to drink secretly behind closed doors and get drunk. It is causing gambling and immorality; it is causing death and blindness.

"We must decide which is the greater evil from a medical standpoint—prohibition or home brew or the free use of light wines and beer properly distilled and brewed under Government standard."

I also insert a few letters appearing in the Chicago Herald and Examiner, which has opened its columns to a forum on "What Has Prohibition Done for Chicago?"

DRYS AND WETS TELL HOW LAW IS WORKING OUT.

The Herald and Examiner opens its columns to a forum for its readers on the subject "What Has Prohibition Done for Chicago?"

LIQUOR IS BLAMED.

PROHIBITION EDITOR:

I think that one of the most deplorable effects of prohibition is reflected in the "sporty" tendency of young women to drink strong liquors as a novelty. I know scores of young women of excellent families who had never before tasted intoxicants of any kind, but who since prohibition have sampled and become actual liquor addicts. It is no longer considered "common."

PRICE VILLAGE VIEWS.

PROHIBITION EDITOR:

Down here in Price Village, Ind., we got a good idea of what prohibition is. There are but 19 families here, and although this was never regarded as a drinking village, 15 of these families are "wet," and prove it daily.

The other four are in doubt about prohibition's results, but opposed to the general idea.

The prohibition vote in the last election certainly must have some purpose, and it was 201,927 out of 27,000,000. Give the people back their liberty. I am 76 years old and know that you can not successfully take it away from them.

CALLS HEADLINE ANSWER.

PROHIBITION EDITOR:

The answer to "What Has Prohibition Done for Chicago?" was answered the other day on the front page of your splendid paper: "Father, crazed by moonshine, kills baby." That is an answer to the hypocritical prohibition bunch.

"WORSE FOR MORE."

PROHIBITION EDITOR:

Prohibition has done nothing important except to cheat the Government out of funds and give the public worse liquor for more money. It was sneaked over on the country and will be abolished very deliberately. Let's stop throwing good money after poor money.

CAN'T LAST, SAYS LETTER.

PROHIBITION EDITOR:

I talk from the standpoint of a temperance enthusiast, and I declare, from my personal observation, that total prohibition in this country is an outrage and will never have either success or long life. There is evidence of it everywhere—more drunkenness in homes, less responsibility on the part of labor, and less return to the Government, whether national or local.

I have known a dozen men who were well-balanced and worth-while citizens until this legislation, furthered by a group of fanatics and sneaked through the legislative channels, was put over on the country. It has brought about national drunkenness of the sneaky sort, and where it has not produced that result it has brought about national sullenness, a new attitude for America.

HUSBAND NOW A DRUNKARD.

PROHIBITION EDITOR:

I inclose my address and ask you to come up at any hour of the day and see the fruits of prohibition—my husband. He is a drunkard, and at the age of 38 had never taken a drink until prohibition was enforced.

MRS. L.

WANTS PURE LIQUOR.

PROHIBITION EDITOR:

For nearly two years, in all, there has been an era of so-called prohibition. The wealthy during this time have had ample liquor, the thieves and the lowest element of our population have had more than ever before, but the workers, who as a class want nothing more than nourishing beer, have been able to have none of it. What miserable hypocrisy! When is this un-American nonsense to be terminated?

Liquor is a medical necessity, isn't it? Then how is it, without change of content, a horrible poison? Let us stop the serving of poisonous drinks at prohibitive prices. Let us have some pure liquor for the serving of which the dispenser pays high tax and asks little money. Let's be done with crime by the half crazed.

BARRIERS BROKEN DOWN.

PROHIBITION EDITOR:

Since prohibition has been in force I notice that many of my friends who either did not drink at all or occasionally drank a gin fizz or some other light drink, have taken to whisky; this is particularly true of women.

As no beer and light wine is obtainable, people who desire to drink at all drink whisky, with the result that those who formerly stayed sober get drunk and those who got drunk get drunker.

I embody a report made by Duell, Warfield & Duell, of New York City, to McClure's Magazine, on the question of prohibition in 1920, which I believe has not heretofore been given to the public, and which I feel is entitled to the most serious consideration:

DUELL, WARFIELD & DUELL,

MCCLURE'S MAGAZINE,
19–23 West Forty-fourth Street,
New York City.

GENTLEMEN: I am forwarding herewith my report in connection with the investigation which I have been making at your request these past weeks relative to war-time prohibition and the possibility of its repeal, to the extent of light wines and beer, before July 1. I am also forwarding to you, together with the report of my investigation, some leading opinions obtained on this subject from many important men and women of the country.

Initially, I have found among labor interests a constantly increasing discontent over the possibility of the workingman being denied his glass of beer—the beer that helps to wash down dried-out lunch in the noonday hour. The workingman is accustomed to his beer, and not only has it been his custom for years but his tradition for centuries. If when July 1 comes it is taken away from him, grave labor unrest will confront the country, becoming more pronounced as the heat of summer increases. There is also another side to this question of labor and beer which will cause great discontent—which, in fact, is leading squarely in the direction of bolshevism—it is the denial to the plain average citizen and workingman what is not denied to the man who is rich or even of moderate wealth. The latter for some months past, and even now, are putting by large stores of various liquors, in many instances sufficient to last a lifetime. Whatever the outcome is to be, all of us, both rich and poor, should share and share alike in the effect of any prohibition legislation. That's only fair play and a square deal. To do otherwise and permit the rich man to have what the poor man can not have is the bitterest sort of class distinction, and any legislation which makes this condition possible is class legislation and accordingly vicious. Such action is playing right into the hands of bolshevism. My investigation also shows that there is wide discontent among the returning soldiers who while fighting were specifically permitted to enjoy, by military order, light wines and beer. They very rightfully can not understand, when they were good enough to fight and die for the country, and could have their light wine or beer, now that the fight is over and they have returned home, why such a simple privilege is denied them.

You find the same sentiment everywhere among the rank and file of citizens, the great middle class in our country who resent bitterly any invasion of their personal privileges as American citizens, their right to the pursuit of normal happiness and enjoyment of life. These same views are also held by many who never drank anything, men and women who are liberal and fair enough to admit that there is no harm in drinking a glass of beer, even the minister who at times enjoys his glass of beer and welsh rarebit.

I reach the conclusion that fundamentally whisky and distilled liquors containing an obviously high alcoholic percentage has been at the basis of the prohibition movement in this country. I firmly believe that if we had never had whisky we never would have even heard of prohibition. Accordingly the elimination of whisky and liquor containing a great amount of alcohol is doubtless wise, for with that another good result will be accomplished, the abolition of the old-fashioned saloon, so called, its "back room," its "barroom rail and family entrance," which has been a great curse to the country and the cause of untold misery and crime. But the question of light wines and beer is a far different matter and presents a harmless compromise. In France, for instance, for centuries light wine has been a part of the daily meal, and in this connection think for a moment of the great strength and virility of the French armies in the recent war. But France thought it wise to put a ban upon absinthe, just as the United States should put the ban upon whisky and legislate against it as a drug.

Here are some leading opinions obtained from many men and women of great prominence in the country who, while standing against whisky and the saloon, favor light wines and beer:

Cardinal Gibbons, with whom I recently had a long talk, writes me as follows:

"To present to the people of the country the issue of the use of light wines and beers, also the abolishing of the saloon of the old type, meets with my hearty approval. For more than 50 years I have preached temperance, being convinced that the practice of the virtue of temperance has regard to the free will and God-given liberty of man, and at the same time makes for merit and reward. I am persuaded that the denial of light wines and beer will be hurtful, if not disastrous, to the cause of temperance, and bring contempt upon the prohibition law. I know the good qualities of the American people, which none esteem more highly than myself. I recognize the worth of that large labor element, the very backbone of our country, and at all times willing to join hands in every fair and honest movement. If, therefore, the law of prohibition can be so interpreted as to permit the use of light wines and beer, I feel sure it will be an efficient measure for temperance and meet with the approval of the majority of our citizens.

"Faithfully, yours,

"J. CARD. GIBBONS."

Here is the opinion held by the late Col. Theodore Roosevelt, as obtained from his sister, Mrs. Douglas Robinson, shortly before his death:

"I remember my brother, Theodore Roosevelt, saying that he found it very difficult to make up his mind positively on the subject, but that he was inclined to feel that it would be wiser at present to allow the sale of light wines and beer."

Mrs. Robinson herself writes as follows:

"After serious thought on the subject of prohibition I have come to the conclusion that it would be well for the country were it possible to allow the sale of light wines and beer, rather than to make so drastic a change as absolute prohibition.

"It would seem that great evils might follow so sudden a change of policy, evils which might outweigh any good resulting from the change.

"Yours, sincerely,

"CORINNE ROOSEVELT ROBINSON
"(MRS. DOUGLAS ROBINSON)."

Mary Roberts Rinehart has this to say:

"It is my sincere conviction that no amendment to the Constitution should be made without a vote of the entire American people. It is also my conviction that the restricted sale of beer and light wines would be a harmless compromise, and would soothe somewhat our feeling of outrage at the present interference with our complete liberty of action.

"Most cordially, yours,

"MARY ROBERTS RINEHART."

Gertrude Atherton writes as follows:

"What are the distractions, enjoyments, pleasures that this country, either in its State or National Government, has provided for the laboring class that it should deprive it of one of the few solaces poor men find for living? Beer gives a gentle stimulation that causes an hour's forgetfulness of the grinding day, the sordid home. In moderation it does no more harm than a symphony concert that exalts a woman's nerves.

"Has it occurred to these 'reformers,' who through the criminal carelessness of wiser men have temporarily obtained the upper hand, that the major part of the laboring class is composed of foreigners, who from birth have been accustomed to light wines and beer? These men have been encouraged to come to this country because our old American stock was so diminished that we must have foreign labor or come to a standstill as a nation, and it is not only a criminal lack of tact but the height of insolence to denationalize their palates and stomachs and force them to wash down their monotonous food with water—ice water, which has ruined the American digestion. It would be no less an infringement on the rights of man, although infinitely more beneficial, to pass a law forbidding the native New Englander to eat doughnuts and pie for breakfast. But it is the doughnut-pie-ice-water brain that is responsible for this most insensate and pernicious law ever passed in the United States."

Mrs. Atherton also says:

"Regulation, the abolishment of saloons (the easy drink) would result in temperance, in many cases in indifference; but prohibition will irritate man in the deepest recesses of his self-respect, with a result that there will be more secret drunkards all over the United States than have ever been known in the history of civilization."

Last, but not of least importance, I insert a statement submitted by Mr. Charles B. Stafford, an attorney of Chicago, to the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Stafford for upward of 20 years has resided in a prohibition territory and has devoted a great deal of thought and study to the prohibition question:

STOP! READ! CONSIDER!

This letter was delivered to the Judiciary Committee after its hearings had closed. I have therefore had it printed. I am sending a copy to each Member of Congress. May I ask you to read it?

CHARLES B. STAFFORD.

CHICAGO, ILL., May 19, 1921.

Hon. ANDREW J. VOLSTEAD,
Chairman, and Members of the Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives of the United States, Washington.

GENTLEMEN: I happened to be in Washington on Friday last, and learning that your committee was listening to suggestions on the bill to prevent the manufacture and sale of beer for medicinal purposes, I asked permission to address you, but was compelled to leave Washington before my name was reached. I was informed, however, that I might present in writing my views.

Permit me to say that at present I reside in Evanston, Ill., and I practice law in Chicago. I claim no authority to speak for anyone other than myself, but from conversation with friends and acquaintances in many parts of the country I believe that in what I shall say I shall voice the opinions and sentiments of a very considerable number of the best citizens of the United States.

Because I am the seventh generation born in this country and have neither affiliations with nor cross-obligations to other nationalities I probably shall say some things that only one born and bred with inherited traditions of this land of the free can either feel or dare utter. Whether it may or may not take several generations to make a gentleman, it does take at least three generations to produce a real American thoroughly imbued with the ideas and conceptions of true Americanism, free from the prejudices and opinions and beliefs which from birth, surrounding circumstances, family life, or education tinge and color the views of all our naturalized citizens.

The Declaration of Independence rang true because it gave utterance to what men and women felt and believed in their heart of hearts. For a hundred years after its adoption we American born, with our mother's milk, with the air we breathed, at school, at play, at home, at work, fed on the truth of the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We believed thoroughly in the Roman republican doctrine that one might do whatever one pleased with one's own provided no injury resulted to one's neighbor. Governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed to protect and secure these inalienable rights and further their enjoyment. Governmental restrictions upon and interference with personal and individual conduct and habits would have driven Washington and Adams and Jefferson into immediate revolt. They are distinctly imperialistic doctrines, foreign grafts being forced upon us by fanatical autocrats who refuse to concede the possibility of any right or merit in an opinion contrary to their propaganda. What has this to do with the proposed bill? This: All proposed legislation should harmonize with our general concepts of American life, American liberty, and American pursuit of happiness.

The proposed legislation has for its object the prevention of manufacture and sale of certain beverages. It attacks these beverages upon the pretense that they are nonmedicinal. The general impression of the public is that it is to further the prohibition movement. It is a reasonably safe conjecture that neither the proponents nor the supporters of this bill had in mind any hygienic or pathological measure. Witness the presence and activity of prohibition's advocates and representatives. It is the transference of incorporeal psychic concept to affect the physical corpus. Medically and morally, I am against the bill.

For the past 40 years that alcohol was a most pernicious and insidious drug and poison has been preached and taught. Most thinking men—and I make bold to include myself in that class—are agreed that immoderate use of alcoholic stimulants is absolutely objectionable. The line of demarcation between moderate and immoderate use is no longer vague or uncertain. In each individual's case an overdose of alcohol is as readily susceptible of determination as an overdose of morphine or strychnine. The amount would vary with each individual, for the effect of all substances, foods, or poisons upon the human body depends upon idiosynerasy. Even milk, nature's best food, will poison some. Fruits, vegetables, and meats are prescribed and proscribed according to the patient's requirements and their effect. That one man's food is another man's poison has been demonstrated to be absolutely true. Coffee, tea, cocoa, sugar are deleterious under certain conditions.

If alcohol be a drug, then put it in the pharmacopœia under the control of enlightened physicians. In that respect the attitude of the prohibitionists is similar to that of the old lady who gave her daughter permission to swim, but forbade going near the water. The medical fraternity may boast with justice that almost without exception it has faithfully and honorably complied with the duties of such trusts. The occasional backsliding druggist, the occasional blacksliding doctor, is soon spotted as an outcast, a leper with whom mere contact means death and speedily put beyond power to harm.

But prohibition is fanatic. It is as intemperate as drunkenness. Its pettiness is beyond limit and destructive of greatness. It may be safely asserted that the history of the world in no nation and in no field of human endeavor lists a topnotcher who was a prohibitionist. The reason is plain. Temperance, voluntary abstinence, is one of the cardinal virtues. It has as its prerequisite self-control, and self-control means strength. But prohibition, intemperance, means fanaticism, lack of control, and narrowness that is inconsistent with greatness.

Legislation to be of value must start with a clear conception and just appreciation of the subject matter. What is the truth about all alcoholics? It is not the use but the abuse that cries out for remedy.

Alcohol is potentially present in all grains, fruits, nay, wherever starch or sugar is. Digestion in a crude sense is the conversion of starch into sugar, and sugar, by easy fermentation, becomes alcohol. If the chemists are right, the prohibitionist should stop eating. For his stomach is to some extent an automatic still turning out a modicum of booze daily. In another sense alcohol is a predigested food. As such it is absorbed in the human body and circulated before it has been properly assimilated and treated by the various organs and agencies involved in the digestive process. To this is attributable the deleterious effect of large doses. Conversely, it is claimed that where there is exhaustion, weakness, or depression, the fact that it requires little from digestive apparatus enables it to feed and nourish those too weak to take or assimilate other foods. According to many authorities it has no permanent or real effect as a stimulus. Conceding this, it is nevertheless universal experience that it does create at least a false stimulating sensation, causing a desire for real food. Hence in mild forms, as beer, it is claimed to be beneficial as an appetizer.

The combination in beer has other effects. The best modern authorities are universally preaching yeast as a healthful aid to digestion. To many yeast in its natural condition is not palatable. It needs disguising.

The ordinary individual finds it necessary to take quinine in a capsule. Castor oil, because of its bulk, is not generally given in capsules, but its value has forced the adoption of a number of blends. No sane person would contend that the use of coffee or orange juice or what else to assist a dose of castor oil should be forbidden. Why decry taking yeast by way of beer? The prohibitionists contend that the near beers, nonalcoholic, furnish the benefits without the curse. They willfully blind themselves to the effect of the chemical changes caused by the omission of any element. Near beers are not palatable. Small quantities of alcohol do stimulate and excite the flow of gastric juices. This starts the operation and aids the yeast. Near beers in this respect fail.

The wholesale, universal, heedless onslaught of prohibition needs a curb. It may be conceded that man can live, thrive, and prosper without alcohol. Man can live, thrive, and prosper without all things but salt and water. Man can and has for centuries lived, thrived, and prospered without prohibition. Fats, fried food, pastry in excess cause all manner of wreckage to health. Should laws be therefore passed to forbid the manufacture and sale of wheat cakes and apple pie? If prohibition be wise, why should there be the silly and cowardly exemption made in the name of religion? Are legislators afraid that church sentiment may line up on the side of the wicked? Theology once made human sacrifice obligatory, but men quickly realized that an all just, all wise, all good, all merciful and loving God would not tolerate much less require wicked deeds in His worship. If wine and beer and other alcoholics are pernicious poisons like opium and morphine, God will have none of them. Be consistent.

If alcohol be the hellish offspring and temptation of the devil, away with it to the last atom and ion. Let us be not afraid. For unto the prayer of the righteous will God ever give ear.

Wise control, temperance, not prohibition, is needed.

It is time to stop and take stock of the moral effect of prohibition. I have for many years lived in a section kept free of saloons by local option. In the suburbs of Chicago along Lake Michigan, north to Waukegan, for years voters were against traffic in liquor. So long as Chicago was wide open the suburban resident was careful to keep the shadow of a saloon from his home. A saloon was an offensive place for which he had neither occasion nor use. So long as liquor of all kinds and quantities could be brought from Chicago, local option was perfection. Residence in a dry State like Indiana was ideal so long as it was bounded by wet Ohio, wet Kentucky, and wet Illinois. The Hoosier lived in paradise with the tree of knowledge a few hours' ride to Cincinnati, Louisville, or Chicago.

The advent of national prohibition has brought widespread change in the attitude of citizens. Many who rarely touched liquor, actuated by a resentment to personal restriction, take pleasure in showing their opposition by frequent and open violation. Many financially able laid in stores sufficient to last their estimated lives. Bootlegging and private stills have been encouraged by others. Robberies, burglaries, perjury, forgery, and other crimes have become prevalent. The price that can be obtained for liquor has encouraged lawbreaking. Men otherwise exemplary citizens feel justified in aiding and abetting illegal traffic in liquor.

True it is that in republics majorities should govern. But in our American concept, local options—majorities in constitutional divisions of State, county, city, town—must be recognized and dealt with. There is a limit to the tyranny of majorities. This was boldly set forth in the Declaration of Independence.

One of the earliest amendments to the Constitution recognized that certain subject matters should not be legislated without unanimous consent. That list was not intended to include all exemptions. One of the original thirteen States accepted the Constitution upon condition that no further power would be conceded to the Federal Government. It demonstrates the American conception of inalienable rights that government should not be permitted to invade. It did not include prohibition, because no man then alive could conceive the possibility of such legislation.

There is of necessity a limit when unanimous consent must be necessary. Suppose some great religion should obtain a three-fourths control of the country. Suppose its heads should first amend the Constitution by eliminating religion from the list requiring unanimous consent, and, having thus paved the way, pass a constitutional amendment and other laws fixing an exclusive state religion for these United States and providing for enforcing conformity. Such things could not be, say you? Such a condition is no more impossible than national prohibition was to an American 40 years ago.

Every constitutional amendment and every enactment passed over the wishes of a large majority and jammed down on such minority is cursed by destroying in such minority that love of country and respect of law and order that should be the chief virtue of a citizen. Witness the effect of the abolition amendments and laws passed after the Civil War. The Southern States have always refused to accept them, have evaded and nullified them whenever and wherever possible. Worse than all, the effect of that tyrannical outburst of abolitionism! It has ever since destroyed independence of thought and action by Southern States on all questions. For whatever arises is now by Southern States first tested by: How will it affect the Negro situation? It is absolutely certain that the support by Southern States to this very prohibition proposition was given not that the white man of the South desired to forego his julep or toddy but that the menace of the drunken Negro should be destroyed. With the Negro eliminated, the South would be overwhelmingly against prohibition, because it is overwhelmingly in favor of the broadest liberty of personal action and conduct.

Fanatical radicalism has always been followed by wildest riot. Witness the Puritan control of England. No set of men were personally more pure in thought or action, more sincerely desirous of benefiting mankind, more altruistic in purpose of establishing God's heaven on earth, than the founders of the Puritanism that beheaded Charles I and installed Cromwell as ruler of England. And then followed the unspeakable debauchery of mind, body, and soul of the reign of Charles II.

Because I believe in temperance, I am opposed to prohibition. Because I believe that beverages like beer, with small alcoholic content, are in many cases beneficial, I believe their manufacture and sale should be allowed. Because I believe that alcoholics in all forms are drugs, I believe their manufacture should be under careful governmental supervision and their use and sale under the control of intelligent physicians. Because I believe not in drastic coercion but enlightened persuasion, I believe the most beneficial results and permanent good will follow, not from prohibition, but from governmental control through the doctors.

Because I believe your committee is sincerely interested in trying to work out legislation that will prove wise and helpful, I take the liberty of making these suggestions that may open a line of thought which, if not productive of good, may at least prevent what in my humble opinion threatens to be the most egregious of blunders.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES B. STAFFORD.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the few articles, statements, and communications of the many thousands which I have received and which I have taken the privilege to insert will be read and studied by the gentlemen who are advocating this legislation with the hope that they will realize the tremendous resentment against further restrictive legislation, and if they are sincere in eliminating the illicit manufacture of spirits and increasing drunkenness that they themselves will recommend the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer.

Mr. CLASSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield four and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I voted against the Volstead Act because I believed it was a radical misinterpretation of the manifest purpose of the eighteenth amendment. In section 35 of that bill it was provided that very heavy penalties might be imposed upon citizens charged with the illegal manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors without first establishing their guilt by the ordinary processes of the law.

The bill which we are now considering expressly approves and reenacts this anomalous provision of that act. Under its provisions a citizen may be deprived of his property and subjected to all sorts of taxes and penalties, to quote the statute, "upon evidence of such illegal manufacture or sale." Not "upon proof," mind you, not "upon conviction," but "upon evidence of such illegal manufacture or sale a tax shall be assessed against and collected from the person responsible for such illegal manufacture or sale in double the amount now provided by law, with an additional penalty of $500 on retail dealers and $1,000 on manufacturers." What sort of evidence? The statute does not prescribe. It may be direct, positive, circumstantial. An affidavit that a party is or has been making liquor illegally may be taken by the enforcement officer as evidence, although the accused has never been confronted by the witness. An assessment of double the old tax, plus all the penalties and in addition thereto $1,000, is made.

The party assessed may protest his innocence, but, if the enforcement officer so decides, his claim in abatement will be disallowed and the collector instructed to distrain the property of the accused. His only recourse then is to sue out a writ of injunction in the Federal court and satisfy the Federal judge, if he can, that the Government is proceeding without "evidence."

Let us suppose a case. A still is found up the creek in a thicket on Friday, whereupon our old friend John Doe informs the officers that he saw our equally old friend Richard Roe on the preceding Thursday coming out of the woods near the place where the still had been discovered, his countenance illumined by a smile of satisfaction such as had not been observable theretofore since the adoption of the eighteenth amendment.

Would this be evidence of the guilt of the said Richard, and if not, why not?

But, in addition to this, suppose that Mr. Doe should make affidavit to other and more convincing circumstances touching the guilt of Mr. Roe. This would be evidence, and in that enthusiasm which characterizes the zeal of the prohibition officers, overlooking the fact that these two gentlemen had many times appeared as litigants the one against the other in the civil as well as the criminal courts of the realm, can it be doubted that poor Richard would be duly assessed under the provisions of section 35?

"I am not guilty," he would naturally insist, assuring the commissioner that the smile was the effect of reminiscence and not of indulgence; but this has nothing to do with the case, and there would be no occasion to cumber the RECORD with any such irrelevant matter. The law says "upon evidence," not upon proof, not upon conviction, not upon guilt, but "upon evidence," and the law books all tell us that there is a very marked difference between evidence and proof. Evidence is that which is legally submitted to a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of establishing proof of the allegations in controversy. It may not be sufficient to establish the fact; it may fall far short of proof, but it is none the less evidence. This language was written into the bill by the Committee on the Judiciary of this House, a committee composed exclusively of gentlemen learned in the law, and the enforcement officers must assume that they meant what and only exactly what they said.

Now, this case may be said to be an extreme and unwarrantable assumption, but as a matter of fact it is nothing more than the usual practice, if I am correctly informed. I have heard related in the cloakroom by a number of gentlemen numerous instances no less remarkable than this one.

One gentleman a few days ago related that a reputable druggist had been assessed $2,400, his offense consisting of an alleged unlawful sale of a bottle of Tichnor's Antiseptic. The druggist protested his innocence; insisted that he had in no wise violated the statute. He was not indicted, not haled into court to answer any criminal charge, simply assessed $2,400 "upon evidence."

But this is not all. The last paragraph in section 35 is as follows:

> The commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may compromise any civil cause arising under this title before bringing action in court.

And so forth.

This druggist wrote to his Congressman, and, knowing him to be a reputable druggist and convinced that he would not intentionally violate the law, this Member took the matter up over the phone with the prohibition officer here, and was told that they would compromise the matter upon the payment of $25. Evidently the evidence upon which they had proceeded was not very convincing to them. Upon going to the office, however, no one there could be found who was authorized to make any such proposition or who had, in fact, had any conversation with him over the phone, but he was told that the case would be compromised for $100.

An instance in my district has come to my notice: A friend of mine wrote me that a Negro farmer had been assessed $3,200 on what the prohibition officer considered evidence that he had been making whisky. The Negro denied his guilt, and the gentleman who wrote me about it says that he does not believe the Negro is guilty. Whatever the truth may be, the fact is that he has never been convicted. His claim in abatement was overruled and the collector has been instructed to proceed at once to the collection of this $3,200. This man probably has not more than $600 or $800 in property, such as is usually owned by tenant farmers—a mule or two, wagon, farm implements, and so forth. His only recourse is to apply for a writ of injunction, and if granted the issue would be decided not by a jury but by the Federal judge himself, and under the law he would only be called upon to decide whether the commissioner had "evidence of the unlawful manufacture" by the accused.

Assume that this man is not guilty, as he claims, and that when the case comes on for trial in the Federal court and the evidence is submitted the judge, testing it by the rules of evidence which have been sanctioned by the experience and the wisdom of centuries, decides it is insufficient to establish guilt; judgment of "not guilty" will thereupon be directed to be entered and the defendant permitted to go hence without day. This, however, does not affect the proceedings of the collector, and although this evidence has been declared insufficient the first and only time it has ever been submitted to a court of justice for its judgment, the accused has nevertheless been despoiled of his goods and chattels and his property confiscated and he has no recourse.

Gentlemen, we ought not to write such a law on the statute book. The liberty of the citizen ought to be held more sacred than this. I am a prohibitionist, and have been all my life. I am not swept off of my feet, therefore, by the enthusiasm and zeal characteristic of the new convert. If men violate the statute and persist in making or selling liquor illegally, they should be haled into court and punished without mercy for their malefactions. The foundations of liberty, however, are assailed and menaced if in our enthusiasm we lose sight of all the experiences through which our fathers fought and overthrew tyranny and deliberately empower some agent of the Government to take the property of the citizen and brand him as a lawbreaker without proof, without conviction, without confronting him with the witnesses upon whose testimony he is to be condemned, but merely "upon evidence" the competency and sufficiency of which have not and can not be passed upon by the courts of the country.

I do not know how many officers there are in the United States going about seeking the violators of the Volstead Act. There are many of them, and we know how they are appointed. The people have no voice in their selection and they are in no wise responsible to the people or dependent upon them for their jobs. Can we afford to put into their hands this power, the power to assess merely upon evidence and then to compromise? To me the proposition seems monstrous, and I shall vote against it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, the eighteenth amendment is now a part of the organic law, by the decree of the American people speaking through their Congress and State legislatures. The enforcement act is on the statute books. It is to assure the country against making the amendment a dead letter.

We thought we had interdicted beer until the decision of Attorney General Palmer, which opened the way for its manufacture and sale by aid of a physician's prescription.

The insistence of the liberal Members of this House for the privilege of beer through a policy of prescription clearly shows the extremity to which these people will go to indulge their appetites for liquor. For 15 months prior to the Palmer ruling, which covers the period of the prohibition régime, not a prescription was written for the use of beer as a medicine. Thirty-eight States had already made it unlawful. The State of Ohio took such action by a tremendous vote after the Palmer ruling had been made.

Under the law no physician could prescribe distilled liquor without a permit. Seventy-eight per cent of the 152,627 physicians in the United States made no application for permit for such purposes. Only a bare 22 per cent made application. Twenty-four States had already made it unlawful to prescribe distilled liquor as a medicine.

Not until the Palmer ruling was there any contention for the use of beer as a medicine. On the other hand, it had been repudiated by the vast aggregation of reputable physicians. It it not recognized by science or law. It is not even listed as a medicine in the American Pharmacopœia, the recognized authority in medicine in America. It is not included as a medicine in the reputable textbooks generally used throughout the medical schools. But, on the other hand, its use as such has been discountenanced by the most eminent physicians, surgeons, and scientists. It has been rejected by professors of medicine in 24 reputable medical colleges, including the special research institutions for medical advancement, such as the Rockefeller Institute, the Mayo Foundation, and other expert institutions. It was repudiated by the officers and members of the convention which revised the American Pharmacopœia.

Beer as a medicine was emphatically denounced by the druggists of the United States in national convention assembled in the following language:

The executive committee of the National Association of Retail Druggists of the United States desire to place on record their conviction that the manufacture and sale of beer and other malt liquors for medicinal purposes should not be permitted. Malt liquors have never been listed in the United States Pharmacopœia as official medicinal remedies.

The demand for beer does not come from the sick chamber or the convalescent. Neither does it come from the physician's office, as it does not come from any distinguished authority on the science of medicine. It does come from the brewing interests under the guise of healing. It also comes from the advocate of beverage drinking. Its loudest call is from the habitué of the saloon.

The proposed measure is necessary to prevent, under the guise of medicine, the flooding of the country with beer. Omission of such measure will open again the beer-drinking place through the agency of the prescription. The less reputable practitioner who thinks more of boodle than of cure under the Palmer ruling can convert his office into a beer-guzzling house, where he can dole out through prescription by the bottle, the case, or the keg as best suits his trade.

The contention of these people is so bald that the purpose can not be misunderstood. If they do not know now, they will soon discover that the American people have no patience with this contention. The saloon is an outlaw. Prohibition is law, and under enforcement will become reality. I can only repeat what I recently said in Philadelphia, "If such foolish contention as this last gasp of the booze advocates is not discontinued, this Congress will make this country as dry as the Sahara desert." To those of our Members who continue to argue for liquor upon the ground that prohibition can not be enforced, I can only say, if they will join us in enforcement legislation with the same aggressiveness that they oppose this legislation, we will raise up a generation in this country with appetites unpolluted from the drink habit, when no such legislation as this proposed act will be necessary. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the cry for beer comes not from the sick but from the thirsty. [Laughter.] A hue and cry is set up by beer guzzlers that we are "depriving the sick of their beer." The truth is, there are hundreds of thousands of sick men and women in America to-day because they were not deprived of beer—hundreds of thousands who can not pass a life-insurance examination because of a hobnailed or cirrhosed liver which has resulted from beer drinking.

The physicians do not want to prescribe beer. Hospitals do not want to use beer. The druggists do not want to sell beer, and the sick are not wanting to drink beer. The tears that are being shed because of restrictive beer legislation are all falling from the eyes of perfectly well men who have developed a beer appetite.

Restriction on beer is nothing new. During the 15 months of prohibition prior to the Palmer ruling beer could not be prescribed anywhere in the United States, and even since that ruling the prescribing of it has been unlawful in 38 States.

ATTITUDE OF MEDICAL PROFESSION.

The Campbell bill now under consideration proposes to assist in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment by regulating the medical use of alcoholic liquors. Let us consider briefly the attitude of the medical profession on this moot question.

Alcohol is a habit-forming narcotic poison. No scientific medical man in all the world disputes this fact. Its evil effects on the human system so far surpass any beneficial effects that the overwhelming verdict of the medical profession is to-day wholly against its use.

One hundred and twenty thousand physicians in the United States have not written one prescription for alcoholic liquor of any kind, including beer, during the last 15 months.

WHISKY, BRANDY, WINE, AND BEER ARE NOT MEDICINES.

Reference has been made here this afternoon several times to the National Pharmacopœia. Perhaps those references have not been well understood. The National Pharmacopœia is the official and recognized list of the useful medical drugs and chemicals of the United States. It is the same to the medical profession that the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are to the legal profession. This United States Pharmacopœia has been rewritten by the highest medical, chemical, and pharmaceutical authorities in the United States every 10 years during the last 90 years. It has also been revised every 5 years, and in every case is finally approved by act of Congress.

The last Pharmacopœia, revised by the representatives of the scientific societies of every State in the Union in September, 1916, does not regard whisky, brandy, wine, or beer as of any value whatever in the treatment of any disease; hence they are all omitted, and alcohol is not mentioned as a drug but only as a chemical. We thus reduce all alcoholic liquors to the status of habit-producing narcotic poisons, and should deal with them accordingly.

In 1917 the American Medical Association, which is the mouthpiece of 150,000 physicians in the United States, declared its position in these unmistakable terms:

AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION OPPOSES USE OF ALCOHOL.

Whereas we believe that the use of alcohol as a beverage is detrimental to the human economy; and
Whereas its use in therapeutics as a tonic or stimulant or as a food has no scientific basis: Therefore be it
Resolved, That the American Medical Association opposes the use of alcohol as a beverage; and be it further Resolved, That the use of alcohol as a therapeutic agent be discouraged.

In 1918, Dr. Arthur Dean Bevan, of Chicago, President of the American Medical Association, called upon the 150,000 physicians who acknowledge allegiance to the association to take an active part in the propaganda in favor of prohibition as the greatest single factor they could control in the interests of the public health.

PERSONAL OBSERVATIONS.

During the last 10 years of an extensive practice of medicine I found no necessity for administering or prescribing a single dram of alcoholic liquor in any form. I do not question that worthy and honorable physicians do prescribe alcoholic liquors, but I maintain that, judged by the general and final results, our patients were better off without the liquor than with it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] states that every physician in Congress is in favor of beer prescriptions. The gentleman misrepresents my position as a physician on the whole liquor question. Throughout my professional life I have worked and voted against the liquor traffic in city, State, and national elections. As a member of my own State legislature I had an active part in passing "bone-dry" legislation. As a Member of Congress I helped to pass the national prohibition enforcement law, and when it was vetoed by President Wilson I helped to pass it over his veto.

Beer legislation, which is sought by our big cities, would be a backward step, an entering wedge for beer saloons and the old saloon régime. The wet forces are recruiting to-day for the next congressional election, but the voters will not be caught napping. Every law-enforcement officer in the United States knows the eighteenth amendment can not be enforced if we let down the bars for beer and wine.

The opinion of any individual physician, however, is not now under consideration. I have given you the testimony of the overwhelming majority, and we are to-day legislating for the majority.

PRESCRIPTIONS SOUGHT IN BAD FAITH.

Viewed in the light of modern scientific knowledge and experience, we would be justified in making the provisions of the bill now under consideration much more stringent than they are now written. Certainly no Member of this Congress need fear that he is depriving either patient or physician of a remedy that can not be better supplied in some other way.

We all know that alcoholic prescriptions are often sought and often given in bad faith, and now that the eighteenth amendment has been deliberately written into our Constitution by the votes of the people, we owe it as our duty to the people to provide for its enforcement.

WET PROPAGANDISTS FLOOD NEWSPAPERS WITH MISLEADING STATEMENTS.

Wet propagandists flood the newspapers and put into the mouths of the unwary the babel that national prohibition was suddenly obtained by some hocus-pocus method while the great American public slept—or, perchance, while it was fighting overseas.

Nothing could be further from the truth.

PROHIBITION THE RESULT OF EDUCATION.

At least 132 years ago an active temperance society was organized in Connecticut; the Sober Society was organized in Pennsylvania a hundred and fifteen years ago; the Independent Order of Good Templars was organized in New York in 1851 and swept the country for half a century; the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with Frances Willard as its great leader, and with a little band of devoted mothers in almost every county in the United States, has been quietly educating the American people for more than 50 years.

Perhaps my wet friends do not know that this organization has written scientific temperance in the textbooks of every State in the Union and has thus made known to all the people that alcohol is a narcotic poison, whether taken in large quantities or small.

After a century of education, during which time the distillers and brewers scoffed and mocked, came the great Anti-Saloon League and gathered up and crystallized the educated anti-booze sentiment and completed the job of making America dry.

Can deliberate action taken after an educational campaign of 132 years be termed "emotionalism" or "fanaticism"?

For 70 years one State after another outlawed the liquor traffic, but complete law enforcement was always difficult or impossible because of surrounding wet territory.

The moral sentiment of America would not yield to these discouragements. By 1915 27,000,000 of people living in 19 States had voluntarily deprived themselves of intoxicating liquors as a beverage. This so-called "emotionalism" extended from Maine to Washington, from Alabama to North Dakota. No limited section of the country was inundated by this "wave" that had been gathering force for 130 years. Meanwhile 50 per cent of the population of 12 other States had voted themselves dry; and 25 per cent of 9 other States had also committed the awful deed of depriving themselves of intoxicating liquors.

The Federal Government had now taken a forward step and the sale of liquor was prohibited in all Indian country, in the Navy, the Panama Canal Zone, and the Army canteens were closed.

Fifty-one millions of our people, by a majority vote, were living in dry territory and 80 per cent of our territory was dry two full years before we entered the war and six more entire States had entered the dry column before war was declared.

Finally 75,000,000 of sober-thinking, liberty-loving Americans had deprived themselves of booze; and 2,374 out of 2,989 counties in the United States voted out the saloon.

Local option and State-wide elections everywhere showed an overwhelming sentiment, not only against strong liquor but also against wines and beer.

Eight million voters petitioned Congress for the eighteenth amendment. No petition of the same magnitude was ever, before or since, presented to any legislative body on this earth.

When the Sixty-fifth Congress, which was elected in November, 1916, six month before we declared war, had deliberated for many months it offered the eighteenth amendment to the 48 States for adoption or rejection.

While the ratification by 36 States would have legalized this amendment, the sentiment in favor of national prohibition was so strong that 45 State legislatures ratified the amendment in an incredibly short time.

The first 10 amendments to the Constitution of the United States were ratified by 11 States, and three—Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Georgia—failed to ratify.

The eleventh and twelfth amendments were ratified by three-fourths of the States.

The thirteenth amendment was a prohibitory amendment, and specified in section 2 that Congress should have power to enforce that article by appropriate legislation. That is the kind of legislation and that is the precedent we are following to-day. That amendment was ratified by 27 of the 36 States.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the fourteenth amendment, which provides for your seat and mine in the Halls of this Congress, was alternately approved and disapproved by many of the States, and never was approved by several of them, and yet I hear no complaint from any Member of this House against the fourteenth amendment.

The fifteenth amendment was ratified by 30 of the 37 States. The sixteenth amendment was ratified by 26 States, while 12 failed to ratify.

The seventeenth amendment was ratified by only 36 of our 48 States; but the eighteenth, or national prohibition, amendment was ratified by 45 States within 13 months after it was submitted, leaving only 3 States which have to this date failed to ratify.

Gentlemen, I submit to you that this eighteenth amendment, the enforcement of which we are now providing for, has been ratified by a larger number and a greater proportion of States than any other amendment that has ever been submitted, and yet gentlemen have the temerity to propose that it be nullified by lack of enforcement.

Mr. Speaker, the people demand enforcement and not nullification of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER].

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I desire to add my hearty approbation of this bill. [Applause.] The district from which I come has for years been dry. That particular district looks to this Congress, dominated as it is by a majority of Republicans, to carry out to the fullest extent the intent and spirit of the Volstead Act. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLASSON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL]. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the discussion this afternoon has been a very interesting discussion, and it must have been an interesting discussion to the author of this bill, who sits in the gallery beyond us, Mr. Wheeler. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Is that the Mr. Wheeler, the $50,000 attorney that has been referred to on several occasions?

Mr. HILL. I understand he is the $25,000 attorney for the Antisaloon League.

Mr. BLANTON. And he is a good one.

Mr. KINDRED. Is he paid by Rockefeller money?

Mr. HILL. I understand he is paid by Rockefeller money. Gentlemen of the House, I shall not extend my remarks in the RECORD, because I am speaking to the House of Representatives and not to constituents. And what I shall say to the House of Representatives is on the subject of this particular and precise bill and not on the general subject of prohibition.

As preparatory to my remarks on this special bill, I want to quote to you the language of Mr. Wheeler before the Judiciary Committee to show you the underlying spirit behind this bill. On page 252 of the proceedings before the Judiciary Committee the attorney for the Anti-Saloon League, who claimed in the daily press two days ago that he wrote the bill, said:

> If it comes to the point where it must be a choice between medicaments of medical preparation and the enforcement of law, I think we must choose law enforcement.

Now, that is all right about law enforcement. We stand for enforcement of existing laws; but, I say to you, hesitate before you put an unconstitutional act on the statute books of the United States. The time has come when you must look carefully to see how far your zeal for prohibition will carry you in unconstitutional and tyrannical measures. I shall submit my few remarks entirely on the subject of the Constitution and this amendment.

The eighteenth amendment gives you authority to do only one thing. It gives you the authority to stop the manufacture and sale and transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. It gives you absolutely no authority to pass this bill, which was drafted by the Anti-Saloon League. This bill has gone through four phases. The first phase was H. R. 5033, introduced April 25 by Mr. VOLSTEAD. The second phase was 6752, with amendments introduced by Mr. VOLSTEAD. The third phase was 6752, with some more amendments, and the last was 7294, introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], which was the original bill with sections 3, 4, and 5 cut out.

Now, let us look at the bill as it stands. Section 2 is as follows, and I ask the serious consideration of the House for what I am about to read, because I say sincerely that I hope the House would pause before it passes the bill. Section 2 says:

> That only spirituous and vinous liquor may be prescribed for medicinal purposes, and all permits to prescribe and prescriptions for any other liquor shall be void.

What that means, my colleagues, is that the House is asked to pass legislation which says that no malt liquors, beer, ale, stout, porter, can be prescribed by a physician as a medicine for the sick, and I say to you that you have not the constitutional authority under the eighteenth amendment to do it.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. No; the gentleman can not yield. I here submit to you three final considerations. This bill is a direct slander on the integrity of the doctors of this country. It makes no difference if there is only one doctor in this country who desires to prescribe one malt liquor to one sick man, he has a constitutional right to do it, and, gentlemen, those who favor this bill are trying to class as lawbreakers all of the doctors instead of taking the trouble to send to jail those doctors who are crooks. So I say that no matter how rabid and wild a prohibitionist you may be, hesitate before you pass this unconstitutional bill in order that the sincerity of this Congress may not be involved.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I had no idea of taking the time of the House, and would not except for the cowardly way that my friend has attacked the gentleman in the gallery, Mr. Wheeler. I want to say that I have opposed Mr. Wheeler in lawsuits and in politics, and have known him intimately, and if my friend from Maryland ever achieves the reputation for honesty, ability, and integrity that Wayne B. Wheeler has he will deserve it. [Applause.] I happen to know that Mr. Wheeler did not prepare this bill, and that he does not receive one-third of the salary that my wild friend from Maryland imagines he does. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to some provisions in this bill which, in my judgment, are impractical, unjust, and unnecessary to its beneficial operation. This bill (1) discriminates against light wines in favor of hard liquors by permitting the prescription of more than twice as much alcohol in hard liquors as in light wines. (2) It unjustly operates against the manufacturer and the consumer of medicinal wines by confining production to the supply of current needs. That means the consumption for medicinal purposes of unripe wines and denies the use of "aged" wines, which physicians have universally favored for medicinal purposes. (3) It subjects the labor and investment of the vineyardist to the hazard of securing a permit from a commissioner in Washington, who has no practical knowledge of the situation of the vineyardist or his problems. (4) By placing the very life of an industry which is expressly made lawful at the arbitrary disposal of a commissioner at Washington it opens a fruitful field for scandal, bribery, fraud, and favoritism, which should not be encouraged by law.

The constitutional prohibition amendment prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors * * * for beverage purposes." No one has claimed that the object of Federal prohibition was to prohibit the medicinal use of alcoholic liquors. This bill provides intoxicating liquors may properly and lawfully be prescribed for medicinal use by expressly authorizing the prescription of whisky and wine. It limits the medicinal use of alcoholic liquors by prohibiting the prescription of beer. It limits each physician to 100 prescriptions in 90 days. It also limits the quantity of such liquors which may be furnished on any prescription to not more than 1 quart of vinous liquors, and also limits all liquors so furnished to an alcoholic content of one-half pint. Wines so prescribed shall contain not more than 24 per cent of alcohol.

These limitations permit the prescription of one-half a pint of alcohol in whisky and wines of high alcoholic content to one prescription within 10 days. Natural wines form the bulk of American production and have no alcohol, except that produced by the natural fermentation of their sugar content. Such wines average 11 per cent or less of alcohol. The limitation to 1 quart in 10 days makes the maximum alcoholic content of such light wines that can be so prescribed less than 2 ounces in 10 days, or an equivalent to less than one-fifth of an ounce per day for a patient. That is less than one-half of the amount of alcohol that can be prescribed through whisky and fortified wines. The purpose is to restrict the use of alcohol. Yet light wine is limited by volume and hard liquors are limited by alcoholic content. In other words, section 1 of this law is so drawn as to constitute a discrimination in favor of hard liquors and against light wines, which are the most wholesome for medicinal purposes.

Having authorized the prescription of one-half a pint of alcohol as contained in whisky and wines of high alcoholic content, there is no logical or just reason why only one-half of that amount should be permitted in the more wholesome natural wines. The tendency of the provision is to encourage the fortification of wines and the addition of alcohol to the natural product. A patient desiring light wine will probably buy the 24 per cent wine and increase its quantity by the addition of water and thus double the volume that he can procure lawfully. He will use an inferior substitute instead of the more wholesome light wine that he desired. This discrimination thus operates against the natural wines in favor of those that are adulterated or at least have alcohol artificially added to increase their alcoholic content.

This bill would also operate unjustly against the vineyardist and the manufacturer of wines. The last paragraph of section 2 prohibits the manufacture of vinous or spirituous liquor, save alcohol, "until the amount of such liquor now in distilleries and other bonded warehouses," shall have been reduced to a quantity "that in the opinion of the commissioner will, with liquor that may thereafter be manufactured, be sufficient to supply the current need thereafter for all nonbeverage uses." Spirituous liquors are manufactured almost entirely from products that have a value in the general market, being useful for feed and other purposes as well as for the manufacture of alcoholic liquors. Natural wines are made from grapes produced on vines, which require four years to reach a productive crop and which grapes are ordinarily of little or no value for any purpose other than making wine. There is some propriety for this provision as to distilled liquors, but it should not apply to wines.

Many months are required to clarify wines properly. Age is necessary to develop their best qualities. Physicians since Biblical times have always recommended "old wines" for medicinal purposes. This law, if strictly followed, will prohibit the advanced manufacture that is necessary to produce aged wines for medicinal purposes.

The vineyardist can not hold grapes for manufacture until his wines are required for current needs. His labor, his investment, and his crop precedes the manufacture. If denied manufacture when the crop is ripe, he is denied the benefit of his labor and his investment.

It is a gross injustice to the vineyardist to subject him to this hazard—to make the use and value of his crop depend upon the whim of a commissioner in Washington; to make his right to manufacture after he has produced his crop depend upon whether or not some commissioner in Washington thinks his wine product is required for current medicinal needs.

As a general rule bureaucratic government exercised far from the scene of its practical operation will be arbitrary, technical, domineering, theoretical, and indifferent. No one knows how unreasonable and unbusinesslike any commissioner may be or how completely he will be dominated by influences who have neither the desire or inclination to do justice in such matters.

These provisions are entirely unnecessary to the successful operation of the law proposed. I make no objection to the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. I support its efficient enforcement. But in my judgment impractical provisions that ignore the just rights of people engaged in lawful occupations have no legitimate place in the statutes of our country. Physicians who unlawfully prescribe intoxicating liquors should be prosecuted, but it will not aid the enforcement of legitimate prohibition to provide a system under which, in attempting to punish the guilty, we impose unjust and unnecessary hardships upon the innocent.

I believe it most unfortunate that a measure of this character should be passed by the Congress without an opportunity of amendment. Why should the "gag" rule be applied to this bill? The House is absolutely denied the right of correcting or improving this measure or changing the proposed law to conform to its best judgment. Such measures as this should be presented in an open forum, where every Member has a right to express his own judgment by his vote upon every important phase of a bill. I hope when this measure reaches the Senate it will be so amended as to remove these unjust provisions. That can be done without in any way detracting from the substantial purposes of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill?

The question was taken, and Mr. SABATH demanded a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the years and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 250, nays 93, answered "present" 2, not voting 86, as follows:

Mr. YATES. Should there not then be two pairs against one?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, that is the very question I was going to raise. I answered "present" because I have a general pair with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], who is absent on account of illness. I do not know how he would vote on this bill. He has not advised me. I think he would vote aye, but, not being sure about it, I want to know what my duty under the circumstances is, as I have been so busy that I have made no arrangements about a two-to-one pair, to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES] refers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to exercise his own judgment as to that.

Mr. LANGLEY. All right; then I shall let my answer of "present" stand in the record.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER]. May I ask if he is recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman voted "aye."

Mr. TREADWAY. Am I within the limit of voting? I would like to vote "aye."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. TREADWAY. I came in when the Clerk was announcing the pairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from New York, Mr. FISH, who is indisposed. I wish to withdraw my vote of "aye" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. KNUTSON was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. OLIVER. I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I understand I was paired with the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. JOHNSON.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. CARTER. I was right after——

The SPEAKER. Of course, the gentleman can not vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MALONEY, for two weeks.

PROCEEDINGS DURING RECESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement of the proceedings during the recess be entered in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman makes that motion, will he yield for a moment? I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if by adjourning he thinks we will expedite the consideration of the tariff bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I feel quite confident we will.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we bless Thee this morning, Thou Holy One, who dost inhabit eternity and yet condescend to dwell in the humble and contrite heart, making for Thyself a habitation of our spirit. AMERICAN LEGION POSTS IN FRANCE.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a letter relating to a statement made by me recently in regard to the number of American soldiers' organizations in foreign countries. The information that this letter contains will indicate to what extent our veterans have banded themselves all over the world for mutual comradeship and benefit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., June 25, 1921.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: A speech made by you, which appeared on pages 2416 and 2417 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, has been called to my attention, the statement being that "Post No. 605, Veterans of Foreign Wars, located in Paris, is the only post of American soldiers located in foreign countries."

I desire to correct this impression that you have, as the American Legion not only has several posts in France and several in England but also posts in every foreign country in the world. This is merely for your information.

I beg to remain,
Sincerely, JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
Vice Chairman National Legislative Committee.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PHIPPS presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the board of directors of the Delta Chamber of Commerce, of Delta, Colo., June 16, 1921, favoring the granting of some form of financial relief to the live-stock industry of the western United States, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CONDITIONS IN IRELAND.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a very strong letter in support of a resolution now pending before a committee of the Senate by Alice Stone Blackwell, the daughter of one of America's great women and herself a journalist of distinction and a leader in the suffrage and all other movements for the elevation and progress of women. Miss Blackwell has also been deeply interested in the causes of suffering and persecuted peoples throughout the world.

This letter was recently published in the Christian Register, a religious paper of influence and wide circulation in Boston and New England.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IRELAND.

To the EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER:

Abraham Lincoln drafted the following resolution at a meeting held on September 12, 1849, when Hungary was trying in vain to set up a republic:

Resolved, That in their present glorious struggle for liberty, Hungarians command our highest admiration and have our warmest sympathy.

That they have our most ardent prayers for their speedy triumph and final success.

That the Government of the United States should acknowledge the independence of Hungary as a nation of freemen at the very earliest moment consistent with our amicable relations with the government against which they are contending.

Thomas Jefferson, when Secretary of State, wrote, as official spokesman for President Washington, to the United States minister to France, on November 7, 1792:

It accords with our principles to acknowledge any government to be rightful which is formed by the will of the nation substantially declared.

Lloyd-George said to the House of Commons after the Irish elections of 1918:

If you asked the people of Ireland what they would accept, by an emphatic majority they would say, "We want independence and an Irish republic." There is absolutely no doubt about that. The elected representatives of Ireland now by a clear, definite majority have declared in favor of independence.

Another election has just shown the same thing. According to the principles of Washington and Jefferson, the case for recognition of the Irish republic is complete.

We recognized Cuba and all the other Latin-American Republics that struggled to free themselves from Spain; we have recognized the Republic of Panama and the Republic of Armenia.

No doubt the thought expressed in the last clause of Lincoln's resolution will carry much weight; but even those who feel that we can not recognize the Irish republic ought to wish that we could.

The case of our Confederate States, often quoted in this connection, is not a parallel. The Confederate States had entered the Union of their own free will. They were like a woman who has been married with her own consent; Ireland is like a woman who has been seized by force and is held in most unwilling subjection.

Unitarians pride themselves on freedom from religious and race prejudice; but if Ireland were an island off the coast of Spain, with the majority of the inhabitants Protestants of British descent, and one little corner of the island Spanish and Catholic, and if the relations between that Island and Spain were in all other respects the same as those between Ireland and Great Britain, my impression is that those Unitarians who are now pro-British in their sympathies would be decidedly anti-Spanish.

This is said not out of any ill will toward Great Britain. I am an Englishman's daughter, and I love England, but I love justice and liberty more.

ALICE STONE BLACKWELL.

DORCHESTER, MASS., June 23, 1921.

THE COAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram which I have just received and ask that it be read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., June 28, 1921.

Hon. Senator FRELINGHUYSEN,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.:

The independent coal dealers of Chicago heartily indorse your seasonal freight bill and also your stabilization bill. These bills are a great benefit to the public, especially in remedying a condition which now exists and has existed for the last year. The whole country is now tied body and foot and hand to organizations formed to extract the highest toll out of the buying public, more especially in the coal trade of our city.

INDEPENDENT COAL DEALERS' ASSOCIATION OF CHICAGO,
By WILLIAM O'ROURKE, Secretary.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR VETERANS OF WORLD WAR.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 506) to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

REFUNDING ON FOREIGN LOANS.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to Senate bill No. 2135, a bill to enable the refunding of obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance, and also printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the amendment was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts to the bill (S. 2135) to enable the refunding of obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes, viz: On page 2, line 11, add:

"Provided, That no agreement with a foreign Government with respect to any measure hereinabove authorized shall be deemed to have been completed, nor to enjoy full force and effect, until it shall have been specifically embodied in a convention duly concluded by the President of the United States and ratified and proclaimed by him, by and with the consent and advice of the Senate of the United States, under Article II, section 2, clause 2, of the Constitution of the United States."

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 100), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the state of war between the United States and Germany which was declared to exist by the joint resolution approved April 6, 1917, entitled "Joint resolution declaring that a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government of the United States," etc., was in fact brought to an end by the capitulation of Germany contained in the articles of armistice of November 11, 1918; and

Whereas there is an existing state of peace between the United States and Germany, which state of peace has not been formally declared or recognized by the Government of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President is respectfully requested to negotiate a treaty with Germany which shall secure from Germany a complete recognition and assurance of the rights and interests of the Government of the United States and its nationals stipulated in the treaty of Versailles, settle and adjust all outstanding questions and claims of the Government of the United States and its nationals against the German Government, and provide for amity and commerce between the United States and Germany.

RATIFICATION OF TREATY OF VERSAILLES WITH EXCEPTIONS.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 101), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the state of war between the United States and Germany, which was declared to exist by the joint resolution approved April 6, 1917, entitled "Joint resolution declaring that a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government of the United States, etc.," was in fact brought to an end by the capitulation of Germany made in the articles of armistice of November 11, 1918; and

Whereas the executory terms and covenants of peace were, pursuant to the stipulations of said armistice, incorporated in the treaty of Versailles which was signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and of Germany on the 28th day of June, 1919, which treaty has been irrevocably ratified by Germany and has been in force since January, 1920; and

Whereas by said treaty Germany cedes to the United States, in conjunction with Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, her overseas possessions, including the German colonies in Africa, the German islands in the Pacific Ocean, and the German cables in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and makes other stipulations which inure to the benefit of the Government and people of the United States; and

Whereas said treaty provides for the resumption of diplomatic relations and of the other relations of peace with Germany; and

Whereas the Government and people of the United States can not obtain the benefit of such stipulations and covenants in their favor without a ratification of the articles of said treaty which inure to the benefit of the Government and people of the United States; and

Whereas Part I of said treaty, comprising articles 1 to 26, inclusive, being the articles of the League of Nations, and Part XIII of said treaty, comprising articles 387 to 427, inclusive, which is ancillary to Part I, are distinct and separable parts of said treaty and do not qualify the rights, titles, and interests of the Government of the United States and of its nationals stipulated and contained in the other parts and articles of the treaty; and

Whereas the Senate of the United States, two-thirds of the Senators concurring, will not agree to advise and consent to the ratification on the part of the United States of Parts I and XIII of said treaty; and

Whereas it is imperative that the terms of peace with Germany be confirmed by the United States, that impediments to the execution of the treaty of Versailles as affecting the interests of the United States and of the allied and associated powers be removed, that the existing state of peace be formally recognized and proclaimed, and that the relations of peace be resumed with Germany: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the treaty of peace concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, be ratified, excepting Part I, comprising articles 1 to 26, inclusive, and Part XIII, comprising articles 387 to 427, inclusive, and that the President is respectfully requested to submit said treaty to the Senate in order that the Senate may advise and consent to the ratification of said treaty with suitable reservations, Parts I and XIII thereof to be expressly excepted from the act of ratification.

PROMOTION OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 102), which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

PROTECTION OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1039) for the public protection of maternity and infancy and providing a method of cooperation between the Government of the United States and the several States. This is the bill which was made a special order for 1 o'clock to-day, and I move to take it up at this time.

Mr. KING. I rise to inquire whether the coal bill, which is the unfinished business, would not automatically be laid before the Senate at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks otherwise. In the absence of a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill, the calendar would be in order at this time. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1039.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa if it is his purpose to make this the permanent business of the Senate or only to take it up in the morning hour?

Mr. KENYON. I assume that the unfinished business will come before the Senate at 2 o'clock. My object in making the motion now was to gain what remains of the extra hour before 1 o'clock. At 1 o'clock the bill becomes the special order of business, as the Senator knows.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, it will displace the unfinished business?

Mr. KENYON. No; I think not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There can not be two bills the unfinished business before the Senate at one time.

Mr. KENYON. This will end at 2 o'clock. I have not been here for a week, but I understand that the unfinished business is the coal bill, and that it will come before the Senate at 2 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I merely wish to understand the status. The Senator is not insisting that his bill shall displace the unfinished business?

Mr. KENYON. No, I am not; but I am going to move to take up this bill at every opportunity I may have. I do not wish to interfere with the consideration of the coal bill. That there may be no misunderstanding about it, I wish to say to the Senator from Alabama that at 2 o'clock, if there is any prospect of a vote this afternoon on the special order, I shall ask the Senator in charge of the coal bill to lay that bill aside temporarily and see if we can not finish this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was merely trying to ascertain the legislative status of the two bills. Of course, at 2 o'clock the Senator would either have to get unanimous consent or make a motion to displace the unfinished business.

Mr. KENYON. I realize that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1039.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1039) for the public protection of maternity and infancy and providing a method of cooperation between the Government of the United States and the several States, which had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me to present a letter?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

RELIEF OF DISABLED EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have received a letter this morning from a prominent citizen of Price, Utah, dated June 22, 1921. I am going to read the letter for the information of the committee that at the present time has charge of the investigation of the Vocational Board and Public Health Service in relation to the expenditure of public money for the benefit of disabled soldiers. This is one of many letters which I have received from different parts of the United States that show where a great deal of the money that is appropriated for the soldier goes and how wrongfully it is spent, doing no good to the soldier, but being really a hindrance to him and a wicked waste of public funds. The letter reads:

PRICE & FOUTS,
Price, Utah, June 22, 1921.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The other day while returning from Duchesne I occupied a seat in the stage with a young man who intends to avail himself of the vocational training offered disabled soldiers by our Government, and in the course of our conversation he stated to me that he was on his way to Price to have his teeth examined, as required by the rules of the department under which he is preparing himself; that he had already been to Salt Lake twice, once to go through a physical examination and the other time to have his eyes tested; that upon his return from Salt Lake for his physical examination there was a notice waiting him to go to Salt Lake to have his eyes tested; that upon his return from Salt Lake there was a notice to go to Price to have his teeth examined; that each trip to Salt Lake costs the Government $35 and that his trip to Price about $17. He himself could not understand why it was that he could not have had his teeth and eyes examined in Salt Lake at the time he took his physical examination and thus save time to himself and money to the Government. I was impressed with the thought that if such needless expenditures prevail in all the departments at Washington that the mothers who gave their sons' lives in the late war would go on forever paying a war tax on medicine necessary in time of sickness.

Knowing that you are opposed to such wanton extravagance, and feeling that the taxpayers of this country are bending under the numerous and heavy taxes imposed, I felt it my duty to call your attention to this seeming indifference on the part of the servants of the taxpayers to the economic methods of operating the various departments of our Government.

Wishing you a successful term as Senator, and that before the present administration shall have concluded its administration that the people who have been so patient will be rewarded by some relief from the burdens they are now carrying, I beg to remain,

Sincerely, yours, C. S. PRICE.

Mr. President, I ask that this letter may be referred to the special committee which is investigating all bureaus and agencies of the Government dealing with the welfare of veterans of the World War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I will, but I will then have to decline to yield further.

Mr. POMERENE. The letter that has just been read by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] recalls to my mind some of the disclosures which were made on yesterday before our special committee which is investigating this subject. One of the most intelligent women that it has been my pleasure to hear in a long time was before our committee. She had been a teacher; she assisted in McHenry Hospital at Baltimore. We were advised by her on yesterday that a large number of these boys were asked to take a course in vulcanizing. Some of the boys did not want to do it. A representative of the Vocational Board said to some of those boys, "You will have to take that course or none." The Government is paying these alleged instructors $30 for each boy to get this kind of instruction that is thrust upon them by some people that have no interest save of the dirty dollars which they get out of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I am not going to yield any further, because I am trying to utilize the extra hour for the consideration of this bill, and it is slipping away pretty fast.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator from Iowa for having yielded a few moments to me.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Utah will appreciate that if a discussion ensues in reference to the matter he has brought to the attention of the Senate it will consume the entire hour.

PROTECTION OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1039) for the public protection of maternity and infancy and providing a method of cooperation between the Government of the United States and the several States.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the bill is before the Senate and I decline to yield further. I am going to take a few moments to explain the bill. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] desires to take 5 or 10 minutes more. Ordinarily I am glad to have questions asked, but I should like to have the bill brought to a vote as quickly as possible. After we are through with explanations of the bill, then, of course, we shall be glad to try to answer any questions that may be asked.

Mr. President, the pending bill is substantially the same as the bill which passed the Senate at the last session, I think, by almost a unanimous vote. It has been termed "the maternity bill." It was reported from our committee at this session, I can not say unanimously, for I think there were two members of the committee who were opposed to it.

The bill is based on the theory of cooperation with the States for the purpose of promoting the care of maternity and infancy. It authorizes appropriations, but does not make appropriations. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has objected to the procedure of other committees providing direct appropriations, so in the pending bill we merely authorize appropriations. An appropriation of $480,000 for each year is authorized to be divided among the States. The purpose of the first appropriation is that each State may have at least $10,000. Then, there is $1,000,000 extra a year authorized to be appropriated, to be divided among all the States in the proportion which their population bears to the population of the United States. No payment may be made until the States have appropriated an equal sum. That is the general scheme and plan under which this proposed legislation is to be operated.

The execution of this proposed legislation is placed under the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor. That matter was all thrashed out on the floor of the Senate the last time the subject was under discussion. I take it there will be some effort made here now to place its administration under the Public Health Service. It should, however, be under the Children's Bureau, which, the bill provides, shall constitute an advisory committee, consisting of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, and the United States Commissioner of Education.

Each State, in order to secure the benefits of the proposed act, must accept its provisions by legislative authority, and must create or designate a State agency to cooperate with the Children's Bureau in carrying out the terms of the act. Not more than 3 per cent—the former bill provided for 5 per cent, but we have made it 3 per cent in this bill—of the additional appropriation of the $1,000,000 which is authorized shall be used for administering the provisions of the act. The employees are to be under the Civil Service Commission.

The vital part of the bill is section 8, which I am going to read:

SEC. 8. That any State desiring to avail itself of the benefits of this act shall, by its agency described in section 4—

That is, the agency which the State creates—submit to the Children's Bureau for its approval detailed plans for carrying out the provisions of this act. These plans shall include the provisions to be made in the State for the administration of the act; and provision for instruction—

The whole bill is based on instruction. I hope Senators will keep that in mind, because the questions that are raised by the opponents of the bill, it seems to me, are formulated without a proper conception of the fundamentals of the bill. Instruction is the corner stone on which the structure is built:

Instruction in the hygiene of maternity and infancy through public health nurses, consultation centers, and other suitable methods.

That is the broad purpose of the bill. We also put in a proviso that agents can not enter the homes or interfere with the people without their consent.

Then, section 9 provides that portions of the money, not to exceed 25 per cent, may be used to provide lecturers who are authorized by educational institutions and are approved by the United States Commissioner of Education.

In a brief way, that is this bill and its object.

Mr. President, the question arises, of course, What is the need of any such measure as that now pending? I simply lay down these facts: There are about 250,000 babies who die every year in this country during their first year of life, and approximately 20,000 mothers. The comparison of the infant mortality and the maternal mortality of the United States with that of other nations is not pleasing to an American citizen. We are seventh in the infant mortality rate and seventeenth in the maternity mortality rate. Outside of certain countries in war-torn Europe, Chile, Japan, and China are the only nations having a higher death rate amongst the babies and the mothers than has the United States. England has gone vastly further than the United States; England has maternity benefits. We have no such thing as that.

The objections raised to this bill before our committee have been many. In the first place, it is stated that it is not a proper function of the Government to interest itself in this subject; that it is socialistic, and it was even claimed that the bill looked to birth control; that its purpose was to develop free love and other kindred absurdities. The opposition before our committee came almost entirely from the antiwoman suffrage associations of the United States.

As to its being no function of the Government to look after the babies or to stimulate the States in looking after the babies and saving their lives, of course that is a question as to which men differ. Those who think that it is no business of the Government ought to vote against this bill. If the Government has no interest in the babies and in the mothers of the country, of course vote against the bill.

We appropriate here for hog cholera. It seems to be a matter of concern to the Government to save the lives of the hogs and the pigs of the country. We appropriate money to eradicate the boll weevil and the pink bollworm and the Japanese boll weevil and the Chinese boll weevil and every other kind of boll weevil; we appropriate funds to kill off the potato weevil and the potato bug; we appropriate money to destroy coyotes, to exterminate ground squirrels and Japanese beetles, and to send garden seed all over the country. All that seems to be consistent with the purposes of the Federal Government; but when it comes to doing anything for the little babies of the country gentlemen hold up their hands in holy horror and say that it is a waste of public money, an invasion of State rights, and so forth.

It is just as much an invasion of State rights to appropriate for hog cholera and the boll weevil. Why do not the States take care of those matters?

Some of the doctors are dissatisfied with this bill. The evidence of a physician from Massachusetts shows that some doctors are dissatisfied with it. The doctors want the work put under the Public Health Service.

I appreciate the argument as to the necessity for economy about which we will hear in connection with this bill. When the Colombian treaty was pending before the Senate I suggested to the Senator from Idaho when he was complaining about hearing nothing of economy that he would hear plenty about economy when we came to this bill. He will. It will be claimed that we can not afford to spend the money for this purpose. I have tried to be consistent on the question of economy, but I can not quite understand how gentlemen who can vote $25,000,000 to a gang of bandits down in Colombia can find fault with an appropriation of a million dollars a year to help save the babies and the mothers of the country; nor can I quite comprehend how gentlemen who can vote $500,000,000 in a naval appropriation bill can raise the cry of economy in connection with an effort to help to the extent of $1,480,000 a year the babies of this country.

Will the bill do the work? Will it save any babies? Is it a feasible project? Is it a silly proposition? Is it sentimental and hysterical for the Senate of the United States to be concerning itself about such a measure as this? Nobody knows what it will do; but I wish Senators would read the testimony of Dr. S. Josephine Baker, director of the Bureau of Child Hygiene of New York City, where a wonderful work has been carried on through consultation centers such as we expect to have provided under the pending bill and through public nurses cooperating with the consultation centers. They have reduced the baby mortality rate in the city of New York to a tremendous degree. That is simply a question of fact. They have saved the lives of 65,000 babies. Of course, Senators may say that is a matter for the States. Yes; but if the States do not take hold of it, and if the Government can give some stimulation to the work and can accomplish any such result as that, is it not worth the money?

Dr. Baker is connected with the health department of New York City. She says in her testimony, on page 122 of the hearings:

> Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, New York City has a bureau of child hygiene and a system of child hygiene work which has resulted in giving New York City the lowest maternal mortality from preventable causes not only of the large cities of the Nation, but also of the large cities of Europe, where statistics are available.
>
> * * * * * * *
> In New York City we have for a number of years carried on a system of maternity protection. By that I do not want to be quoted as saying in any way we have any compulsory maternity work.

Bear in mind that this is all voluntary; it is not intended to force anything on any State; no State has to take it.

> Our women in New York are anxious to obtain this help which we give them. We never canvass for them at all, but they come to us in overwhelming numbers, and they come to us in a greater number than we can take care of, and we have succeeded in the last 10 years in reducing our maternity mortality rates from preventable causes so that they are lower than any of the cities of the United States, and lower than the large cities of Europe.

That is proved by statistics which are cited.

Dr. Baker further says, on page 123:

> Yes, sir. It shows that the United States as a whole is very backward in regard to this subject. It shows that the statement that it is seventeenth in the list is not only true, but it is also a crime against civilization that the mothers of this country should be allowed to die in the manner that they have. It shows that the number of the mothers who died in childbirth during 18 months of the war almost exactly equals the number of soldiers that were lost and killed in battle. In other words, for every soldier killed, a mother died in childbirth, and for every soldier killed six babies died at childbirth, and all because the social and the economical conditions are so poor. It is deplorable for us to realize that, especially when you take into consideration the fact that the remedy is so easily obtained, and also the fact that this is because of a lack of understanding of the subject.
> There has been a steady decrease in the baby death rate, with the result that in the last year the death rate has been 11,000 as compared with 17,000 of 10 years ago. This has been done by the employment of physicians and nurses who visit these families; that is for the family to express a desire to have them come. We maintain public-health stations and we supervise the practice of obstetrics so far as it obtains to midwives.

She says:

> We have decreased the baby death rate from 144 to 85 per thousand births.

That is in New York City.

> And let me tell you what that means, for if the death rate of 144 had been maintained for that length of time, we would have actually had 65,000 more babies die than we have had die.

If in this United States, by stimulation of the States in the method that Congress has followed, the lives of 65,000 babies could be saved, is it not a national problem? When you come to draft men for war you do not just take them from a State to go out and defend a State; you take them for the whole Nation. The problem of saving the children of a nation is a national problem, and the children of this country are its greatest asset.

There are other parts of this testimony that are very interesting. Dr. Baker discusses the difference between making it entirely a medicinal question and making it a social question. She says:

> There is no question about it that the position of the United States at the present time is extremely humiliating. There is not a person now who comes to visit this country, who knows anything about the conditions, who has not remarked about the present curious position of the United States in this behalf. These mothers want to be saved, and they are anxious to get the information which would be sent out. I think that it would be a reasonable estimate to say that we could save some 15,000 women and 100,000 babies a year by passing this bill.

I am not going to take the time to refer to the rest of the testimony. This legislation is indorsed by the governors of some 35 States. It is indorsed by nearly all of the women's organizations of the United States—the League of Women Voters, representing something like 2,000,000 women, the Daughters of the American Revolution, and a long series of women's organizations throughout this country. It may be sentimental legislation—yes; maybe it is. It is a good thing to have some sentiment once in a while in legislation. It is the one bill that the women of this country are asking of the American Congress. Some women in the antisuffrage societies are against it. I do not know why they have taken up the fight against it. The great body of the women of this country are asking the American Congress for the passage of this measure.

Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, I know of the opposition that there is to the bill. I know of the attempts that will be made to put amendments on it. The Senator from New Hampshire has one to establish hospitals all over the country. There are other amendments to be proposed. The object of those amendments is not friendly. The object of those amendments, I think pretty generally, is to kill the bill.

I think I shall not take the time to read over the list of those who are asking for the passage of this bill. I have felt it my duty, as chairman of the committee reporting this bill, to give this brief résumé; and I know that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], who is the father of the measure in the Senate, desires to add to the explanation I have made.

Mr. SHEPPARD obtained the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator was not here when I started. I said that the Senator from Texas wanted to speak, and that after both of us were through we should be glad to answer questions; but I will answer the question if I can.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is immaterial to me, except that I may not be here when the Senator finishes. I wanted to ask the Senator what is the idea of the language on page 2:

> There is permanently authorized to be appropriated * * * $480,000 for each year.

Why do they not appropriate it? What is the point of that language?

Mr. KENYON. I explained that. The Senator was not here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was not here.

Mr. KENYON. A great deal of fault has been found with this committee by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. We have in the past appropriated money. He finds fault with that, and I think his position is well taken, that those appropriations should come from the Committee on Appropriations; so that our committee and other committees in various bills have adopted that language.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It has to go to the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. KENYON. It has to go to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand it now.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, on April 9, 1912, Congress established the Children's Bureau in the Department of Commerce and Labor. On March 4, 1913, Congress transferred this bureau to the Department of Labor, where it remains.

The act creating the Children's Bureau directed it to investigate and report on all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, especially infant mortality, the birth rate, orphanage, juvenile courts, desertion, dangerous occupations, accidents and diseases of children, employment, and legislation affecting children in the several States and Territories. The act provided that no official or agent or representative of the bureau should ever enter any house used exclusively as a family residence over the objection of the head of the family.

It will be observed that the first specific duty assigned the Children's Bureau was the study of infant mortality. That study developed the need of the proposed law relating to maternity and infancy now pending before Congress. Indeed, the bureau found at the outset that the subject of infant mortality demanded immediate attention; that it was a question which the civilized world was beginning seriously to consider.

The bureau found from census figures that 250,000 infants had died in this country in 1913 under 1 year of age, one-half of whom had succumbed from apparently preventable causes. Census calculations demonstrated also that 43 per cent of the infants dying under 1 year of age in a given year were living less than one month; that seven-tenths of the 43 per cent were perishing from prenatal causes or from accident or injury at birth; that 86 per cent of infants living less than one week and 94 per cent of those living less than one day were passing away as a result of like causes and conditions.

Further investigation revealed the fact that thousands of mothers were dying from lack of proper knowledge and proper care while approaching and undergoing the ordeal of maternity.

The bureau ascertained that most of the other leading governments were meeting similar situations with public systems of information, and, in some instances, of actual assistance, reducing their infant and maternal death rates enormously. Let me say here that as a result of the public protection of maternity and infancy 16 or 17 other countries have to-day lower death rates for mothers and 5 have lower death rates for infants than the United States.

The bureau also noted the fact that in certain cities of the United States information services for mothers and infants had been established with promising results; that in the city of New York a system of consultation centers and public health nurses had in a few years reduced the death rate among the mothers and infants cared for until it was near the lowest in the world.

The bureau also observed that the United States for half a century had been distributing useful data on plant and animal life, expending millions to preserve the existence of plants and animals. So the bureau found ample reason for turning its attention under the law of its creation to the development of an educational service in behalf of the Nation's most permanent and precious assets—the mother and the child.

After several years of intensive study, after many investigations and reports, the results of which were embodied in bulletins for public distribution, the Children's Bureau reached the conclusion that if the frightful mortality of mothers and infants which continued to disgrace this Nation was ever effectively to be resisted action involving more than its already authorized program was essential. Accordingly it worked out a plan for National and State cooperation, such a plan as is comprised in the bill before us.

It was shown in the hearings on this bill, both in the last and the present Congress, that nearly 18,000 mothers and 200,000 infants under 1 year of age are dying every year from causes most of which could be removed through proper instruction and information.

Dr. J. Whitridge Williams, obstetrician in chief of Johns Hopkins Hospital, quoted figures in the course of his testimony showing that 45 per cent of all women dying in childbed in this country succumb to infection and 25 per cent to toxemia—that is, the kidney disease of pregnancy. He said that these figures demonstrated that practically three-fourths of all women dying in childbed in the United States perish from two diseases which could almost always be prevented. He added that many of the women who did not die were permanently invalided as a result of childbirth; that one of the great causes of this invalidism was imperfect care. He said that the Johns Hopkins Hospital had found it essential to proper treatment of mothers to organize a prenatal service by which trained workers gave instruction in the hygiene of infancy and maternity in the home. That, Mr. President, is the principal object of the present measure.

Dr. S. Josephine Baker, director of the division of child hygiene of the department of health of the city of New York, appeared at the hearings and gave approval to this bill. She said that the child-hygiene division of the New York City health department favored this bill because of its own experience in child-welfare work and its knowledge that such an enactment could be made a practical working program. She said that this division had carried on for a number of years an extensive campaign in the city of New York for the reduction of infant mortality and for the protection of mothers. She said that repeatedly it had been found that about 40 per cent of deaths of children under 1 year of age occurred during the first month of life; that this was due almost wholly to the mother's condition before the child was born, and that, therefore, the only opportunity to prevent nearly half the deaths was to reach the mother before the babes were born. She said that her work in New York City had proved over and over again that with instruction in the hygiene of maternity the death rate of infants in the first month of life could be reduced one-half or two-thirds. The bill under consideration provides a simple and practicable method for the distribution of such instruction throughout the United States.

During the hearings a statistical bulletin of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., issued in March of 1920, was presented, a bulletin which stated that even at that late date more women were dying in this country from causes incidental to childbearing than from any other cause except tuberculosis; that in regions where no organized effort was being made to give instruction in maternity and infancy hygiene there was 1 maternal death from disorders of childbirth to every 185 confinements; that 1 baby out of every 22 was born dead; that 40 babies out of every thousand born alive lived less than one month. The bulletin indicated, further, that in those areas where women were provided with adequate instruction and care the ratio of deaths to confinements was less than 1 to 400; that 1 baby out of every 85 or 90 was stillborn; and that only 10 babies instead of 40 per 1,000 born alive died under one month of age. The bulletin concluded that prenatal and maternity care held out great promise in life conservation.

The bill before the Senate provides for instruction in the hygiene of maternity and infancy through consultation centers, public health nurses, and similar methods. It offers nothing experimental nor untried. It follows the plan which has operated so successfully in New York City for many years, and which is gaining there in popularity and effectiveness every day. The bill supplements this method with extension courses by qualified lecturers from educational institutions, and with such studies, investigations, and reports as the bureau may find necessary to the efficient administration of this act.

No effort is made in the bill to compel anyone to accept the instruction it provides. The information it supplies, however, is available to all who may desire it. There is nothing in the measure which permits an invasion of the home or intrusion on the privacy of individuals. Indeed, the provision in the act creating the Children's Bureau, which prohibits entry into any home over the objection of the parent, is definitely renewed in this bill.

The bill operates principally through State agencies, but no State is compelled to accept its provisions or to function thereunder. Each State accepting the act gets $10,000 annually from the Federal Government, unconditioned on any appropriation from its own treasury. In addition each State gets annually that proportion of $1,000,000 which its population bears to the population of the Union, provided its legislature appropriates an equal sum. If all the States should be confined to a sum based on population, many small States would receive very little, indeed. The allotment of $10,000 to each, regardless of population or its own contribution, assures to all the States a substantial part in this beneficent work.

The active administration of this measure within a State is to be conducted by the State agency designated for that purpose by the legislature. The Children's Bureau maintains only a general supervision in carrying out the part of the Federal Government in the act.

The Chief of the Children's Bureau is directed to form an advisory committee to consult with the chief and advise concerning problems arising in connection with the administration of the act, such committee to consist of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, and the United States Commissioner of Education.

The Children's Bureau is to recommend the appointment by the State agencies of State advisory committees, at least half of whose members shall be women, and all of whose members shall serve without compensation. These advisory committees are to have branches in every county and community, and it is through them that the act is to have its chief encouragement and support. It is through them that localities are to be organized and awakened to the necessity of greater attention to the problems of motherhood and infancy. It is through them that the consultation centers will become widely advertised information services of the most useful type. It is through them that the comparatively small fund supplied by Federal and State governments under this measure will be supplemented by local contributions and in the end the whole country stirred to the performance of one of the most sacred responsibilities of humanity.

It is clear, therefore, that the principal function of this bill is to provide a nucleus of information and action about which communities are to build for themselves.

It is also clear that the Children's Bureau, with a woman at its head, should have supervision of the act. Indeed, the measure is the outgrowth of the work and study of the Children's Bureau, a logical development of its own functions, functions assigned it by the law which gave it being. Within that bureau are trained and capable physicians who have specialized in the treatment of mothers and children. The statement that this bill will be administered by untrained amateurs and political agents is too absurd and baseless for further mention.

With its nine years of operation and experience, the Children's Bureau has obtained an acquaintance with conditions affected by this bill in every part of the country, an acquaintance with leaders in welfare work throughout the Nation. Thus it is especially qualified for the general administration of this act.

A State secures the benefits of the measure, so far as the uniform amount of $10,000 is concerned, when the legislature signifies acceptance, designates a State agency to carry out the act within the State, and when that agency submits plans of operation in reasonable conformity with the purposes of the act. The State also secures a proportionate share in the additional annual fund of $1,000,000 when, in addition to these steps, it provides an equal sum from its own treasury. The bureau keeps in general touch with the State agencies and may withhold allotments if the purposes of the act are not being accomplished. An appeal may be had to the Secretary of Labor from the decision of the bureau. The chief function of the bureau is to maintain a general observation of the workings of the act in order that its spirit and purpose may be preserved. The details are mainly in the keeping of the local centers.

Attention should be called here to the fact that more than 20 State governors have expressed approval of this enactment and that several State legislatures have already passed laws accepting its terms.

The bill provides an information and instruction service of infinite value. It promotes one of the noblest and purest of aims—the conservation of human life at the source. The fountains of our civilization are motherhood and infancy. The first obligation of society is to the unborn child. The most fundamental right of every human being is to a normal birth. Without it the equal chance which forms the basis of democracy is lost.

This measure stands first in the legislative program of the enfranchised women of America. Full of promise for the future of this Republic is the fact that the advent of women in its political affairs should be marked by the advocacy of a proposal like this. The need of such legislation was developed by the Children's Bureau, an agency directed by women. The first bill for the protection of maternity and infancy was introduced in the Sixty-fifth Congress by Miss Rankin, the first woman Member of the American Congress.

Significant, also, is the fact that the bill is inspired by no partisan authorship or motive. Miss Rankin, the original introducer of a measure of this nature, was and is a Republican. The present bill was offered in the Sixty-sixth Congress by a Republican in the House and a Democrat in the Senate. During that Congress it passed the Senate without division after thorough debate, and after the adoption of important amendments—one of the most important having been offered by the able and distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]—went to the House, where it was favorably reported by the House Committee on Interstate Commerce after extended hearings, but reached the House Calendar so late in the final session that it was not considered on the floor. There is no doubt that it would have passed the House with as emphatic approval as it passed the Senate. Both the Republican and Democratic candidates for President indorsed the measure during the national campaign of 1920, the Democratic national platform approved it, and the Republican President commended it in his first message to the present Congress.

Mr. President, if this Nation declines to take the necessary steps to end the appalling waste of the lives of mothers and children in America, a destruction exceeding every year our total casualties in the most stupendous and terrible war of history, it will invite severest censure. The mother who faces death in childbirth is as much a soldier as the uniformed hero on the field of arms. The World War has ended, but not her battles or her martyrdoms. Through all the centuries that are yet to come whenever a human life is to be ushered into existence she must go down into the valley of another Marne, the shadows of another Somme. For her and for the life that flowers from her blood and tears it is a compelling duty to provide every possible safeguard, to devise every possible protection.

Mr. President, I desire to insert here a memorandum showing the actual operation of one of these consultation centers, in order that Senators may be familiar with it.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON CONSULTATION CENTERS.

A consultation center for infant welfare is a place where health instruction and advice are given to mothers through physicians and public health nurses. Its essential function is to keep well children well.

The work in general is divided into two parts—prenatal and infant. The prenatal work attempts by instruction to the mother during pregnancy to maintain health, to prevent the development of the diseases of pregnancy, and to prepare for any complication of labor. Such care is based on our present medical knowledge of its value for both mother and child. This instruction is accomplished by visits of the mother to the center at stated intervals. Here an examination is conducted by a physician, and advice concerning general care and hygiene is given. The nurse subsequently visits the home to give whatever practical help she can, if the mother desires it. The mother is encouraged to make subsequent visits at regular intervals, so that she can be carefully watched and the first signs of any abnormality detected and corrected. Any abnormalities found which are likely to interfere with her well-being are discussed with the mother, and she is advised to consult her physician with regard to them. If she has no physician, and should she desire, and she usually does, arrangements are made with a hospital clinic for her.

Prenatal instruction affords an opportunity not only of caring for the mother but of instructing her in the important phases of caring for her child and of impressing upon her the importance of health supervision of the baby from the very beginning, particularly as regards feeding, which is certainly the most important aspect of infant care.

Treatment of the baby at the consultation center involves examination, regular weighing, and instruction of the mother concerning the care and feeding of the baby; such instruction followed up with a practical demonstration by the nurse in the home. The importance of the nurse's work in the home can not be overestimated, as the most valuable instruction is conveyed in this way.

At such consultation centers the nurse is usually a full-time paid worker. The physician gives his time for a certain number of conferences a week. In some instances he is paid, in others his work is voluntary. These centers in no way interfere with the private practice of medicine.

The consultation or child health center may be supported by public or private funds or by a combination of the two. If the support is private there is usually formed a voluntary committee or board which assumes responsibility for maintenance, rent, etc.

Mr. SHEPPARD subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks made this morning a brief address on the Children's Bureau delivered by me in the Senate on January 22, 1917, and foreshadowing legislation like that proposed by the pending maternity bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address referred to is as follows:

"Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I can not permit this occasion to pass without expressing my earnest advocacy of the amendment increasing the appropriation for child-welfare work. The first obligation of civilization and government is to the child. Victor Hugo, friend of all mankind, furnished no greater illustration of devotion to humanity than his intense love of children. In his last great novel, "Ninety-three," he gives us what is perhaps the most beautiful description of child life in literature. The scene is an old castle in the forest of La Vendee, the home of a French nobleman in the year 1793, one of the bloodiest years of the French Revolution. With the touch of a master Hugo pictures the three children of the nobleman pursuing innocent delights within the castle, unaware of the war raging about them, of the relentless pursuit of their father by the revolutionists, of the destruction to which their habitation was doomed. Georgette, a baby girl of less than 2 years, leaves her cradle to chatter to a sunbeam, and Hugo utilizes the incident for the following tribute:

"What a bird says in its song a child says in its prattle. It is the same hymn; a hymn indistinct, lisping, profound. The child has what the bird has not—the somber human destiny in front of it. Hence the sadness of men as they listen, mingling with the joy of the little one as it sings. The sublimest canticle to be heard on earth is the stammering of the human soul on the lips of infancy. That confused chirruping of a thought that is as yet no more than indistinct has in it one knows not what sort of artless appeal to the eternal justice; or is it a mute protest uttered on the threshold before entering in, a protest meek and poignant? This ignorance smiling at the infinite compromises all creation in the lot that shall fall to the weak, defenseless being.

"Let me repeat this last sentence:

"This ignorance smiling at the infinite compromises all creation in the lot that shall fall to the weak, defenseless human being.

"Mr. President, this sentence contains an indictment of society and government as just as it is terrible. Does the child die from preventable disease? Is it weakened or deformed through neglect, lack of knowledge, or lack of means to secure proper treatment? Some one must answer to the Almighty.

"Go read the shameful records of infant mortality in this country of boasted enlightenment, of the deaths of mothers on the battle fields of maternity, battle fields where a sublimer valor is exhibited than in all the conflicts that are trumpeted by the tongue of history, and ask yourselves where the responsibility rests.

"The creation of the Children's Bureau in 1912 was an effort on the part of the Federal Government to meet that responsibility, to the extent of its powers and facilities.

"This bureau under the able leadership of Miss Lathrop has already brought to the public attention facts of appalling significance.

"It has shown that in 1913 childbirth caused more deaths among the women of this country than any disease except tuberculosis; that although these deaths are largely preventable they are not diminishing, whereas the mortality due to typhoid fever was cut in half from 1900 to 1913, and the mortality due to tuberculosis was materially reduced; that of those who survived the ordeal of maternity untold thousands find their strength permanently wrecked, their health more or less impaired; that if this frightful condition is to be checked and remedied higher standards of care for women before, during, and after childbirth must be adopted.

"It has made a careful survey of infant mortality in typical manufacturing towns, and it has established a definite relation between this mortality and low earnings. It found in one of the localities under investigation that of the babies with fathers earning less than $450 per year one in four died before reaching the age of 12 months. Fathers earning less than $450 per year amounted to 13.7 per cent of the wage-earning population in the industrial center under survey. It found that the greater number of babies had fathers in the wage group from $450 to $849 per annum, and that of these one in every six died before attaining the age of 12 months. It found that of the babies whose fathers earned $850, but less than $1,050, 1 in every 8 failed to live more than 12 months, and that where fathers earned $1,050 or more only 1 in 16 died in the first year.

"It found that where families composed of 2 or more persons occupied one room the infant mortality was twice as high as where there was less than 1 person per room; that babies living in houses occupied by a single family died at the rate of 86.1 per 1,000, while those in tenements occupied by more than 6 families died at the rate of 236.6 per 1,000; that when the mother was a wage earner the baby's chances of living were less than when she was not.

"When this bureau was established in 1912 it was ordered to report on all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life. For the first two years it had a staff of 15 persons, and an appropriation of $25,640 for each year. In 1914 the staff was increased to 76 persons, the annual appropriation to $164,460.

"Public interest has been aroused in the work of this bureau to such an extent that it finds the present force utterly inadequate. It asks for an increase of 57 persons for its staff, calling for an additional appropriation of $187,520, the total requested being $352,160.

"The bureau's bulletins on the care of infants have met unqualified indorsement and popularity. Letters from grateful mothers have reached the bureau which more than vindicate the wisdom of Congress in creating this beneficient agency.

"The bureau is indexing and assembling the laws relating to child welfare not only for its own guidance but for the guidance of the Government in administering the child-labor law.

"In cooperation with the General Federation of Women's Clubs it has instituted a nation-wide campaign for the closer study of infant mortality, having set aside a certain week known as baby week, during which the entire country is to devote especial attention to all phases of this fundamental problem. More than 2,000 communities took part in baby week in 1916, and a splendid awakening on this great subject was evident.

"The bureau is making a skillful and careful study of defective children and of child mortality in the rural districts.

"The increased force now asked for will be barely sufficient to enable the bureau to meet the public demand for information regarding the work already undertaken.

"It is to me a matter of wonder that Senators hesitate to vote the remarkably small amount desired for this overwhelmingly important work. I would deem it an honor and a duty to vote millions for it, instead of a few hundred thousands.

"If I could have my way, I would have the Federal Government, in cooperation with the States, take whatever steps might be necessary to make certain the proper care of mother and of child in the supreme and holy crisis of maternity.

"And this could be done with infinitely less than we expend each year for the terrible machinery of war.

"It would be a measure of preparedness in the highest and most effective sense. Behind the machine stands the man. Behind the man stands the child.

"Considering the sacredness and the value of the work, the amount desired is modest in the extreme. Including the requested increase, the total appropriation for this bureau will be less than 4 per cent of the cost of one first-class battleship.

"It is not alone a question of expediency but of right. Every human being has an inalienable right to a normal birth. Every human being has an inalienable right to be born under sanitary and comfortable surroundings, under proper treatment and care. Every little life that perishes through lack of knowledge or neglect or finds a precarious survival within a feeble and defective body is an accusation of the Republic and an indictment of the flag."

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, the House on yesterday adopted an amendment to the Volstead Act——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I understand, of course, that the Senator from Louisiana can speak on any subject, and I assume he is not going to speak on the maternity bill. I appeal to the Senator, as we have only until 2 o'clock, to let us go ahead and see if we can not get a vote on this particular bill.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I insist upon addressing the Senate at this time.

Mr. KENYON. I ask, Mr. President, if, when a bill is made a special order in the Senate, as this bill will be at 1 o'clock, any subject can be discussed, or if only that bill can be considered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair knows of no rule which will enable it to confine a Senator's observations to the subject under consideration.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, Mr. President, it utterly destroys the purpose of any special order if a Senator can rise where there is a special order for the consideration of a bill and take the whole time in the discussion of something else. I am not quarreling about it. Of course, if the Senator wants to do that, it is his privilege.

ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION LAWS.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, the Volstead Act was enacted in the year 1919. Since that time various and conflicting regulations have been promulgated and opinions rendered with reference to that act of Congress.

On March 2 or 3 last the Attorney General gave an opinion wherein most of the arbitrary authority assumed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the enforcement department was set aside. The Attorney General held that a physician could not be controlled as to the quantity of liquor which he might administer to his patients. The Attorney General further ruled that the Congress never intended that the commissioner should have the right to designate one distillery for the purpose of manufacturing whisky for medicinal purposes. He further held that those were matters beyond the control of the commissioner and of the enforcement department.

That opinion of the Attorney General was rendered nearly four months ago. We have been informed that regulations have been prepared, and are ready to be issued, in order to control those subjects which I have referred to, as well as a regulation which, in the opinion of the Attorney General, would permit physicians to prescribe beer. Those regulations have been withheld, notwithstanding the fact that nobody disagreed with the opinion of the Attorney General on the subject.

Congress has been in session since the day after that opinion was rendered, and the wheels in one of the various departments created by the Congress of the United States have been stopped by an agent, who, in accordance with the opinion of the Attorney General, has no discretionary power in the matter.

In the House Mr. VOLSTEAD introduced what a Member of the House on the floor yesterday called the Volstead Act junior. The proposed amendment violates every principle upon which our Government was founded. The amendment proposed by Mr. VOLSTEAD not only interferes with the physician and the people who are sick, but goes much further than that. It places in the hands of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the enforcement officials the distribution of alcohol for scientific purposes and for industrial purposes.

When the amendment was proposed and hearings were had during this month it stirred up the American Association of Chemists to such an extent that they sent representatives before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and they pointed out to that committee that it was an interference with national development, with the industries of the country, and that its adoption would be the greatest calamity that could befall the American people. Notwithstanding that, the committee in the House reported the Volstead measure. Then they went to the chairman of the Committee on Rules in the House and appealed to him and brought pressure upon that committee in order to obtain a rule to force the Volstead amendment through the House under a special rule whereby no amendment would be permitted.

The situation therefore became a locked one. The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] then came to the rescue by offering a measure which they pretend is merely for the purpose of preventing physicians from prescribing beer. Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman of the Rules Committee of the House, agreed that the bill could be brought up on the floor of the House, and yesterday, after four hours' debate, the measure was passed there. It was sent to the Senate this morning and will naturally go to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate.

I consider this a very important question. Senators have stood on the floor here and discussed the railroad rates; they have discussed the agricultural condition of the country; they have discussed the finances of the country; but I dare say that the provisions which are proposed under the amendment to the Volstead Act will bring about more dissatisfaction, bring about more discontent, bring about more contempt and disrespect for the law than any one of the other causes which have been discussed on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, the measure which is now before the Senate is merely a forerunner of the Volstead Act junior, which is to follow it. The members of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate know that Mr. Wheeler requested that committee on last Saturday to recommend the bill merely as an emergency measure, but that in the House, with a favorable report from the Judiciary Committee, is the Volstead Act junior, to be urged and pressed upon the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, I am not unmindful of the narrowness of the rabid prohibitionist. I know that in order to have his way in this matter every principle of our Constitution was violated. I know that the bill of rights and all amendments to the United States Constitution, previous to the eighteenth amendment, were for the protection and absolute guarantee of the rights and liberties of our people. I know that this amendment was inserted and grafted into our Constitution by the minority without giving the people an opportunity to be heard. I know that prohibition is a matter of police regulation and has no place in the fundamental law. I know that the insertion of the eighteenth amendment, a mere legislation measure, into our Constitution has destroyed the democratic rule of the majority and makes it possible for 13 of the smallest States of this Union, with a population of less than 7,000,000 people, to rule the other 100,000,000 of our people on this matter because without the consent of 1 of those 13 States prohibition must forever remain embedded in the Constitution.

I know that when our boys were fighting and dying on the battle fields of Europe to establish the rule of self-determination and all really patriotic Americans at home were giving up their time, money, and substance to assist these brave boys, the eighteenth amendment was put over by fanatics under the pretext of saving grain for food; but I also know that the eighteenth amendment does violence to our basic democratic principle of local self-government, which is the same as self-determination. Our boys in Europe and our people at home were also fighting for the protection of the rights of the minority; but I also know that the eighteenth amendment destroyed that principle at home.

I know that the prohibition movement worked under a smoke screen and claimed to be a movement against the saloon, while it really was aimed at the liberty of the people.

This is clearly established by the words of Mr. William H. Anderson, State superintendent Anti-Saloon League of New York, in his circular letter denouncing Mr. Dinwiddie, issued last week, wherein he says:

> The two great nationally recognized prohibition agencies, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Anti-Saloon League, are solidly against his liquor-assisting proposals, as are the temperate agencies of the largest denominations.

Not one of the organizations has been frank enough to use the word "prohibition" in its name. They were after the saloon supposedly, but it required the Federal courts of this Nation to keep them from continuing to invade the sanctity of the homes of Americans. And what is the crime for which the Anti-Saloon League denounced Mr. Dinwiddie? His Americanism would not permit him to interfere with the respectable physician and consent to destroy American industry. He opposed the Volstead amendment now before the House.

Wherein would the American people conceive the idea that an organization fighting the open saloon, an organization calling themselves a temperance union, intended to deprive the physician of the right to prescribe a little whisky, or as much as needed, or to as many patients as he has? Wherein is the construction that our Federal courts have had to intervene to prevent the agencies of the enforcement department, armed with illegal search warrants, from entering homes and taking from them liquor which they had for their own private use?

Mr. President, I could go along this line all day pointing out how the eighteenth amendment violates all of the rights of the people which previous to that time the Federal Constitution protected. But, Mr. President, it is now part and parcel of our Constitution. The highest court of the land has held that it had been legally adopted and that Congress has the authority to enact laws to make it effective; and it likewise maintained the legality of the Volstead Act adopted over the President's veto by the Sixty-sixth Congress in 1919. That decision very properly held that it was up to Congress to say and to define what was an "intoxicating liquor." Since that decision by our highest court some of the prohibitionists have been clamoring for a more rigid and drastic law, while the masses of the people want the Congress to so amend the law and its definition of intoxicating liquors as to permit the sale of beer and wine under State regulation. Enthusiastic advocates of prohibition, upon the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, held funeral services over the supposed dead corpse of John Barleycorn. Since then their periodicals and newspapers continuously remind us that "booze" is dead. They are trying, by suggestion, to lead the people into the belief that it is true. They want to hypnotize the people. But if booze is dead, why do they want millions to enforce this law and are taking up the valuable time of the Congress to enact laws against the dead, as they contend. But, Mr. President, we all know that a law will not stop the doing of a thing which is not a crime per se. Many prohibitionists violate this law. If those who enacted it violate it, why should not those who are opposed to it? Many sincere prohibitionists have changed their minds about this matter. I have in mind one of the leading prohibitionists in my own State. I shall use his case as an illustration. I have known him as a rabid prohibitionist for the last 30 years. At that time he had little of worldly goods. He was a good man and worked hard. Gradually he saved and accumulated, and for several years has been part owner and is at the head of a large business employing hundreds of men. A sincere prohibitionist and idealist, he subsequently advocated prohibition as an economic proposition and frequently discussed this matter with me. He thought he would get more out of labor if he took the laboring man's drink away. He was happy when the eighteenth amendment was finally adopted. After this short period, since its adoption, this man has changed his mind. Just before I left home last January this man came to my office in New Iberia, La., and laid before me a program which he pleaded with me to present to the Congress and the Finance Committee. I asked him for a memorandum of his program, and I desire to read it to the Senate. He is a gentleman of the highest type. He was a sincere prohibitionist, and I have never seen him visit a saloon. There is no better citizen anywhere. Here are his suggestions:

PROHIBITION AND REVENUE—SUGGESTIONS FOR A REVENUE MEASURE.

Prohibition is a failure and does not prohibit. Drunkenness and crime are both on the increase and the people are fast losing respect for all Federal laws. Intoxicants are being sold in quantities at enormous prices in every community. Smugglers, bootleggers, blind tigers, and foreign manufacturers are the only ones being benefited, while the Government is expending large amounts in its futile attempt to enforce its laws.

The excess-profit tax, the surtax, and the numerous special and stamp taxes are excessive, discriminatory, and a deterrence to business, and are one of the fundamentals that are largely responsible for the present demoralized condition of affairs. A revision of these laws is imperative. The proposed sales or turnover tax or the substitution of a higher normal tax for the excess-profits tax will not satisfactorily relieve the burden.

In view of the above it is suggested that the prohibition or eighteenth amendment be repealed—

Mind you, this former very enthusiastic advocate of prohibition is now in favor of repealing the eighteenth amendment—and a high excise tax on intoxicants be substituted therefor, both as a means of revenue and for the better control of the liquor traffic, possibly under a Federal license system. An excise tax be also imposed on cigars and tobacco. A moderately high tariff be imposed on all luxuries and semiluxuries, and only a reasonable amount be raised through a normal income and inheritance tax.

Assuming that under such an arrangement the annual consumption of the above articles would be practically the same as they were for the average five years preceding the war, the following revenue could reasonably be expected at the rates named:

Distilled spirits, 140,000,000 gallons at $15	$2,100,000,000
Fermented liquors, 60,000,000 barrels at $15	900,000,000
Cigars, 9,000,000 thousand at $10	90,000,000
Cigarettes, 30,000,000 thousand at $1	30,000,000
Tobacco, 425,000,000 pounds at $0.10	42,500,000
Tariff on luxuries, such as jewelry, furs, and silks, and on semiluxuries, such as sugar, tea, and coffee, of which we import large quantities and which are ideal revenue producers	400,000,000
Normal income and inheritance taxes	400,000,000
Miscellaneous	38,000,000
Total necessary revenue	4,000,000,000

Mr. President, at the request of this constituent of mine, I submit this program for the consideration of the Finance Committee, whose members are so hard put to in order to find the revenue this Government needs and must have.

At the time this gentleman figured it was then estimated that $4,000,000,000 would be sufficient to run the Government for one year; but we now understand that it will require $5,000,000,000 instead of $4,000,000,000. This is a per capita tax of practically $50. Think of it, Mr. President, a yearly tax of $50 on every man, woman, and child in this country! Is it safe to continue such excessive taxation and appropriate millions to deprive our people of personal liberty? It is dangerous to do so, in my opinion.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the bill proposed. Everyone who has followed the history of the proposed amendment to the national prohibition act knows that the original purpose of those responsible for this outrageous law is not satisfied with the amendment now under discussion. It had been, and still is, the purpose of these people to pass the Volstead amendment, and, although the restrictions of the Volstead amendment as introduced in the House and on which hearings were had do not appear in the Willis amendment, the press announce that the other regulative features as to alcohol for nonbeverage purposes are not abandoned, but will be urged later. The Volstead amendment, reported favorably, is now on the calendar of the House and its proponents intend to pass it and send it to this body. It is intended to pass the Willis amendment at once, because those whose duty it was to enforce the law as interpreted by the Attorney General four months ago, but who have refused to grant to American citizens their clear rights, must be saved from court action to force them to be the servants of the people and not their masters.

Do the American people realize how we are being governed? The Attorney General on March 2 said that the national prohibition act permits doctors to prescribe beer. If that is a fact, then why has the enforcement department denied the people their rights? We are being governed by a clique of arbitrary hypocrites who have no respect for laws which they themselves enacted. What effect has the Palmer opinion had, when after four months the regulations to carry out its meaning have not even been issued? Who is it that is greater than the people and can command the agencies of the Government to disregard a law until time has been afforded to change it? Let the people beware of the sacred rights of liberty bequeathed them, for the same arbitrary, bigoted, fanatical sentiment is even now framing laws against tobacco, laws to take the sun out of Sunday, laws to force all to go to church, and such other sumptuary measures.

We are told that the Volstead amendment will, soon after the passage of the Willis amendment, be pressed; and therefore I desire to discuss its terms and to show how far these people are willing to go to carry out their purpose of controlling our actions.

Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler, general counsel of the Anti-Saloon League, made before the Judiciary Committee of the House on May 20, 1921, a statement, which appears on page 353 of the prohibition legislation, 1921, hearings, as follows, and I should like Senators to pay especial attention to this utterance.

If it comes to the point where it must be a choice between medicaments for medical preparation and the enforcement of law, I think we must choose law enforcement.

Is it possible, Mr. President, that the health of the people is to be subordinated to a mere social experiment? But these people intend to go much further. The above statement was made at a hearing on the Volstead amendment, now pending before the House, under a favorable report, intended to regulate and control the business of all lawful industries needing alcohol in this country.

But, speaking of law enforcement, what are the laws at present? Under the national prohibition act and according to the Palmer opinion the manufacture of alcohol for industrial purposes and for scientific researches is to be encouraged. The physician may prescribe whisky, wine, and beer in the same manner that he may prescribe arsenic, quinine, calomel, and other drugs, while the commissioner may not permit certain distilleries and brewers to operate and outlaw others. These are the laws. Those who shout law enforcement are violating the law and resisting its plain provisions. Those who, in spite of the plain letter and intent of the national prohibition act and the admittedly correct opinion of Mr. Palmer, are responsible for the refusal to issue permits to citizens entitled to them are those who now cry aloud for law enforcement. If Mr. Wheeler would state the case aright, he should say, "If it comes to a choice between the law and medicaments for medicinal preparation on the one hand and our theory of prohibition on the other, we must choose prohibition," for if, as he says, they must choose law enforcement to medicine, then, as a matter of fact, under the law doctors have a right to prescribe that which it is now sought to prevent them prescribing. Certain prohibition advocates are not satisfied with law enforcement, because they refuse to abide by their own law and are asking for other laws, with the knowledge that they will interfere with lawful, necessary industries and the health of the people.

Aside from the fact that I want to see the present national prohibition law modified so as to permit the use of wine and beer and permit physicians to prescribe whisky, I am opposed to the Volstead amendment soon to be pressed before Congress on economic grounds. This measure, if enacted into law, under the pretext of preventing some pervert from drinking antiseptic extracts, hair tonic, or horse medicine, vests in the enforcement department greater powers than have been conferred on any official in Russia under the Czar or in Prussia under the Kaiser. Think of the billions of dollars expended by our people during the war and since in experimenting and promoting scientific research and in the development of fuel, dyes, explosives, chemicals, pharmaceuticals, flavoring extracts, perfumery, sugars, and other necessary and lawful industries, all of which can not be manufactured without alcohol!

Mr. President, the title of the present law now in force and known as the "national prohibition act" reads as follows:

An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and the other lawful purposes.

The war had demonstrated that this Nation was entirely dependent upon foreign markets for some of the most necessary commodities required by our people both in peace and in war, and therefore Congress wanted to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and industries. Had we before the Great War been attacked suddenly by powerful navies and our communication with the rest of the world interrupted we certainly would have suffered because of the lack of many necessities, and without the free use of alcohol for industrial and war purposes would necessarily have been defeated. Alcohol has played the most important part in scientific discoveries and the development of industry and war activities in all the nations of the world. Naturally the Congress must take that into consideration. We should demand that those who are conducting scientific research in this country and those engaged in industries in this country needing alcohol that have to compete with foreign manufacture have as free and as unlimited quantities of alcohol as are needed. The advocates of new restrictions will answer that the proposed Volstead amendment does that by vesting in the commissioner the discretionary power to decide for each line of business the quantity that is needed. Is that based upon common sense? Will our people enter fields of industry and research, invest millions in enterprises which must have alcohol, and depend upon the whims and caprices of a bureau chief who may at any time decrease or stop the supply of this essential article? The mere statement is absurd. Think how the powers delegated to the commissioner could be used to favor some business concern by allowing it all the alcohol it needs and limiting his competitors! The commissioner can not know what quantity each concern in the same line of business nor what quantity in the different lines of business requires. I know it will be claimed that the amendment now before us, introduced by the junior Senator from Ohio, does not so provide; but the mere introduction of the Volstead amendment and the promise that its restrictions will be urged are enough to intimidate capital and further upset business conditions in this country.

We can not afford to give the commissioner the right arbitrarily to limit the quantity of alcohol that is necessary to scientific research or in the development of great industries. This is contrary to the best interests of our Government and its people. The commissioner could deny alcohol to some; he could favor others; he could deny it to certain localities or States, and destroy the business of some persons or localities for the benefit of other persons or localities.

Mr. President, the business of this country is now disorganized. There is already too much governmental regulation. Why create boards, commissioners, or agents with such unlimited powers? This is a constitutional government. We have a written Constitution. Why not adhere to it? I am sure no honest commissioner would want such powers as are provided for in the proposed bill. One would think that the Volstead amendment had been written by our foreign business competitors.

America, Mr. President, must be permitted to develop. Her scientists and industries must not depend for their existence or profits upon regulations issued by the chief of any bureau or department. I would not even give this arbitrary power to the President without reference to whom he is. Its very enactment will affect capital and business. Business will naturally keep out of fields of enterprise that must every day inquire if the regulations have been changed or the permit under which it is suffered to do business has been rescinded. It is the duty of Congress to enact laws. Let us quit creating czars with full power to regulate, discourage, or suppress lawful business. This Nation needs to encourage business instead of encouraging fanaticism and intolerance.

Mr. President, chemists look upon alcohol as one of the most essential and important materials of their industry. They put it in the same class with sulphuric acid, benzol, or caustic soda. There can be no great development of chemical industry without alcohol any more than there could be a steel industry without pig iron, an electric industry without copper, or a fertilizer industry without potash or nitrogen. The great Napoleon realized the importance of chemistry to the industries. He started the work which made possible the greatest development of all the ages. Germany grasped the significance and importance of applied chemistry and made marvelous progress.

The chief element in that development was alcohol, and now come narrow-minded, intolerant people who propose to the most intelligent legislative body in the world to intimidate, hinder, and harass American capital, brain, and industry under the pretext that occasionally some man, once a proud and free American citizen who toiled and was a real producer, deprived of his liberty and freedom, denied a glass of beer or wine in his home with his family, is driven to drink some cosmetic, hair tonic, or horse nostrum. To save the lives of those few for whose death they are responsible they would treat physicians and pharmacists as criminals, bootleggers, and rum runners, and stop the industrial development of this Nation. While the eighteenth amendment was under consideration they called all the active antis "pro-Germans." What should be said of them when their measures now favor foreign competitors?

Prohibition, Mr. President, can not be classed as a national necessity. It is merely a social experiment, and it should certainly not be so administered as to interfere with the economic needs or the national defense requirements of the country any more than a similar experiment should be permitted to disorganize the working forces or interrupt the production of our factories.

Under existing laws a manufacturer using alcohol is required to submit a sworn application and furnish bond, quantitative formula, sample of product, advertising matter, and so forth. The commissioner can withhold the permit if, in his judgment, the product is fit for use as an intoxicating beverage, and even after issuing the permit he has authority to deal with any article on the market if it violates the limitations prescribed by him in its manufacture. These powers are set forth in sections 4, 5, 6, and other sections of the national prohibition act. Under the proposed Volstead amendment the right granted a manufacturer under the national prohibition act to a review by a court of the rulings of the commissioner as to a change of formula or the canceling of a permit is sought to be repealed. His right to have reviewed the commissioner's refusal to issue a permit is proposed to be retained, but once the permit is issued the commissioner is to be supreme. No court may review the unreasonableness or arbitrariness of his decree changing a formula, canceling a permit, or any other arbitrary action by him.

Another reason for my opposing the proposed Volstead amendment is the fact that, even though the commissioner may not directly limit the quantity of alcohol produced, he may, by limiting the quantity consumed, limit the quantity produced. One of the by-products of the manufacture of sugar is molasses. Fully half of the agricultural people of my State are interested in sugar, and therefore in its by-product, molasses. Beet-sugar producers are also interested. We produce in Louisiana annually millions of gallons of molasses, commonly called blackstrap. Before the molasses was used in the manufacture of alcohol some of it sold at 25 cents per barrel of 50 gallons for stock feed. Later in the season the rest was thrown away. We were compelled to pass laws to prevent its being turned into our rivers, where the fish were killed by it. There are even Federal statutes on the subject. Thirty-five million four hundred and fifty-two thousand one hundred and ninety-three gallons of molasses were used in Louisiana alone for the manufacture of industrial alcohol for the year ending June 30, 1920. I refer Senators to the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the fiscal year ended June 3, 1920, on page 131. Prices for our blackstrap molasses, since it is being used for the production of industrial alcohol, range from 15 cents to 20 cents per gallon. It is easily understood that my people would be vitally affected by the proposed further restrictions on the use of industrial alcohol.

Mr. President, the figures just given show the interest the people I here represent have in not unjustly or arbitrarily reducing the use of an important and most essential article which they produce. Agriculture has been discriminated against to the point that our farmers are discouraged. The young men brought up on the farm are no longer satisfied with conditions on the farm. In order to avoid the drinking by a few of nostrums unfit for beverage purposes, we are asked so to control the manufacture of alcohol indirectly by the arbitrary control of its use for nonbeverage purposes as to interfere with scientific research and the manufacture of necessary articles and at the same time injure the farmer who produces corn, molasses, and other farm products when the farmers are already so unjustly treated that the majority of our people now live in towns and cities.

Mr. President, I believe it is well established that even the present law is too drastic and that its enforcement is a joke. Just as long as our people do not look upon its violation as a crime in itself, it will be a failure. You can not legislate morals into the people. Laws denouncing crimes which the majority of our people abhor and condemn can be enforced; but sumptuary laws which a majority of our people in many sections of the country do not approve can not be enforced.

The present national prohibition act has confidence in no one and trusts no one. The physicians of this country are as high a class of men as are found in any country in the world. Our family physician has access to our home. To him are intrusted many family secrets. We hardly ever hear that one of them has betrayed his patient. They are permitted to administer as drugs the most deadly poisons. The law does not interfere in that; but the law now being considered is intended to make a criminal of the physician if he prescribes any beer at all or if he prescribes more than 1 quart of wine per 10 days. Think of it! The Government assumes that all physicians and druggists in this country are potential criminals, bootleggers, rum runners, and law violators! No wonder the American Therapeutic Society, at its meeting in Washington on June 3, denounced the national prohibition act. I shall read the report of this society, composed of noted physicians and specialists, as reported in the Washington Post of June 4, 1921.

I desire to preface the reading of that by saying that this association has only 100 members and that it does not receive applications for membership, but physicians who attain eminence and become noted in this country are invited to become members. The maximum limit is retained at 100, and there are now 35 physicians of national reputation waiting to be admitted into this organization. What do they say?

After deliberate debate in executive council, the American Therapeutic Society, composed of eminent physicians from all parts of the United States, last night decided to petition the President of the United States, the various committees of Congress, and the prohibition enforcement officer to lay aside all rigid restrictions which now prevent physicians from administering or prescribing alcohol "unless they are branded as potential bootleggers."

Led by Dr. Jacob Diner, of New York City, a specialist on internal diseases, the Therapeutic Society, now assembled at the Arlington Hotel for its twenty-second annual meeting went on formal record as opposed to the manner in which physicians are restricted by the prohibition enforcement officers and adopted a resolution which will be forwarded to the White House and the Capitol some time to-day.

Alcohol is a drug with a definite action, a drug that is useful in many conditions, say the memoranda prepared by Dr. Diner. It is not only useful but it is necessary in the treatment of certain diseases. It is also useful from the surgical standpoint. Be it therefore

Resolved, That physicians and surgeons should have the unimpaired right of prescribing this drug without any foolish restrictions. We do not mean that we approve of liquor prescribing physicians nor do we wish to interfere with or violate the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, but we do maintain that no legislative body, or enforcement authority, should limit or hamper a doctor in the legitimate practice or legitimate exercise of his function as a physician.

There have been eminent men of the profession who proved conclusively that alcohol has its beneficial effect on gastric conditions, on the proper function of metabolism—which has to do with the building up and breaking down of tissue—and that alcohol is also beneficial in conditions such as diabetes, sugar in the blood. In many instances alcohol has warded off fatal termination of diabetic conditions.

It is therefore logical that the American Therapeutic Society, composed of men who make their life work the study of preventative medicine, should take action at this time and call upon the President of the United States and the various interested committees of Congress, along with the prohibition enforcement authority, for relief from limitations that are hampering them in the practice of their profession.

Rated as one of the most prominent medical societies in the United States, the American Therapeutic Society has a limited membership of 100 members and a waiting list of 35, it was stated last night by Dr. Noble P. Barnes, of Washington, chairman of the council. No man in the medical profession, it is said, can be admitted to membership in this organization by making application. He must first attain eminence in his profession and then serve a period of what amounts to probation. After that, if he receives the entire 100 votes of the membership he is elected.

I should think that the Congress of the United States should hesitate when men of this caliber, men who comply with such strict qualifications, assemble here and solemnly, in the shadow of this Capitol, demand that the manacles placed around them, which prevent the prosecution of scientific research for the discovery of preventives of the ailments of humankind, be removed; we should at least permit these men to prescribe such quantities of alcohol and as frequently as in their opinion they think necessary. What do we know about whether beer or whisky is a medicine? I should think as a layman that if whisky is a medicine so is beer. They are both very good to drink, and as far as I am concerned that is the only qualification, and I think it is the only qualification all the Senators have on that subject. They ought to be willing to accept the recommendations of such a class of physicians, which to my mind are equal to those of any other organization of scientific physicians in the world.

The Post continues:

That this organization deems it necessary to take the action it has will cause a stir in medical circles, as this is the first time since the adoption of the eighteenth amendment that any organized society of physicians or surgeons has asked for the abolition of certain features of the prohibition enforcement law.

Mr. President, these physicians are asking that the restrictions under the present law be removed, while at the same time we are asked to put on further restrictions.

Now, continuing the quotation from the Post:

The action followed a symposium on alcohol when papers were read by prominent physicians touching every phase of the subject. Literally John Barleycorn was laid on the dissecting table.

By special invitation Dr. Eugene Lyman Fisk, of New York, delivered a discourse on the relationship of alcohol to modern health ideals. It was after this that the council of the society convened and decided to petition the President and Congress for relief from a condition which Dr. Diner described as one which places the American physician in the class of the potential bootlegger. "We are allowed to prescribe quinine" he said; "we should be allowed to prescribe alcohol without being censured by those who know nothing of the practice of medicine."

At the afternoon session of the society papers were read on various subjects relating to therapeutics by Dr. Thomas E. Satterthwaite, of New York; Dr. James M. Anders, of Philadelphia; Dr. W. Wayne Babcock, of Philadelphia; Dr. E. Bosworth MacCready, of Pittsburgh; Dr. Levin and Dr. John Blake White, of New York.

The American Institute of Homeopathy also met here in Washington last week. It was their seventy-seventh annual session. The Washington Post of June 23, 1921, carries an account of their protest of the restriction of the national prohibition act, now the governing statute, not directed at those acts which are intended to make it more rigid in its application but protesting against the present law. This protest reads as follows:

Branded as an indictment against the honesty and integrity of practicing physicians, the medical restrictions of the Volstead Act are scathingly condemned in a resolution adopted last night by the board of trustees of the American Institute of Homeopathy. Final action of the organization is expected this morning when the deliberations of the board are placed before a delegation of almost 2,000 physicians, representing the complete membership of the Institute.

In a resolution framed a week ago at an executive meeting of the American Medical Editors' Association, and which is herewith made public for the first time, there is an added protest against contemplated restrictions in the supplemental Volstead bill now before Congress. Preliminary to taking action on the resolution the board of trustees of the institute yesterday called upon Prohibition Commissioner Haynes for an explanation of certain details in the enforcement law, asking that some one from the Federal office appear before the board of trustees and clear away some misunderstanding of the law.

They were surprised when Wayne B. Wheeler, of the Anti-Saloon League, came to the meeting and undertook to solve the physicians' problem.

So the counsel of the Anti-Saloon League will come before the committees of Congress attempting to solve this medical question. Naturally he may assume to advise us on the question of medicine after having gone before this body of eminent physicians in order to solve this problem.

The Post article continues:

The resolution was brought before the board of trustees by Dr. Lester E. Siemon, of Cleveland, Ohio. It reads as follows:

"Whereas the medical restrictions of the Volstead Act, together with its various administrative and other interpretations and rules and regulations and enforcements, etc., constitute in some of their effects indictment of the medical profession and harassment of the medical practitioner and the sick, and are obstacles to free pursuit of honest medical judgment and therapeutics and have reacted to the detriment of society and the public health and are opposed to public policy; and

"Whereas some of these restrictions and rules and regulations and interpretations, etc., are not based upon consensus of medical experience and practice and established usage; and

"Whereas it is apparent that they have not been framed and interpreted and administered with full appreciation of all matters involved; and

"Whereas the precedent established by the Volstead Act in restricting medical practice should, if physicians value their therapeutic liberty, be met with a protest that will command attention; and

"Whereas the point at issue is the right of the physician to select his remedy and to decide what doses of these remedies each patient requires; and

"Whereas this issue in no wise affects and has nothing to do with propaganda, either for or against prohibition, but is purely a matter of preserving the necessary right of the physician in the interests of public health and public policy: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the American Institute of Homeopathy protest against further regulation of therapeutic procedure by statute or by administrative interpretation or regulation; and be it

"Resolved, That the institute request of the proper authorities a review and revision of such existing statutes or rules or regulations as may be unduly restrictive of the therapeutic judgment and procedure of physicians."

We ask this for the preservation of the necessary rights of the medical profession and in the name of public welfare and wise public policy.

Dr. John B. Sutherland, of Boston, dean of the Boston University, School of Medicine, said that it was not the intention of the Medical Institute of Homeopathy to go on record either for or against prohibition; that what interests the physicians attending the convention here is a removal of certain restrictions which actually hamper them in their work and which for the general good of the public should be removed.

It is understood that Mr. Wheeler was given to understand the same thing; that Dr. H. M. Stephenson, of Baltimore, and Dr. Sieman, who introduced the resolution, pointed out to Mr. Wheeler the many obstacles placed in the way of physicians by clerks and inexperienced expounders of the law who sometimes prevent the sick and wounded from having medicine with alcoholic contents.

The Louisiana State Board of Pharmacy on June 21, 1921, adopted the following resolution:

LOUISIANA STATE BOARD OF PHARMACY,
Hammond, La., June 21, 1921.

Hon. EDWIN S. BROUSSARD,
Member of Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Believing the passage of H. R. 5033 to be detrimental to the pharmaceutical profession of this State, we ask your kind and careful consideration to the following resolution recently passed by our board:

"Resolution.

"We, the Louisiana State Board of Pharmacy, enter a protest, collectively and individually, and as representatives of the pharmacists of the State of Louisiana, against the passage of H. R. 5033, on the ground that it would seriously hamper, if not destroy, the retail drug and pharmaceutical service, indispensable to the public. Many other good reasons for the defeat of this bill could also be given. We trust that you use your influence to defeat this bill, which 2,500 pharmacists of Louisiana protest against."

Respectfully submitted.

LOUISIANA STATE BOARD OF PHARMACY,
J. E. GUESS, Secretary.

Of course, paid experts of the Anti-Saloon League claim alcohol has no medicinal properties, but unless they so testify they would not be in the pay of this organization. The fact remains, Mr. President, that while the present amendment is being discussed here, and the Volstead amendment is ready to follow it here from the House, these prominent physicians and pharmacists are denouncing the national prohibition act, demanding that they be not restricted and interfered with. If the present laws are already too rigid and restrictive, I ask Senators, Why pass this measure, to be followed by the Volstead amendment?

George Washington said:

The foundation of our Government is laid in private morals.

Certainly, Mr. President, the only security of this Government to-day is the good morals of its citizenship. A government which enacts laws that can not be enforced except with bayonets will soon cease to be a free government. No law which brands half of its people as criminals can retain the respect of its entire people and the world. Many of our best people, including the present President of the United States, do not regard prohibition as a moral question. Neither did President Wilson, who could not give his consent to the laws now on our statute books, and therefore vetoed the national prohibition act. Therefore, the enactment of laws so stringent as to deprive a man of his right to do that which is not a crime per se makes him critical of the wisdom of his government and tends to breed contempt of the law. Many people think that such methods breed discontent and even anarchy. Witness what Mr. Van Buren has to say on this subject. No man or woman is better able to judge of the facts than Mr. Van Buren, who yesterday severed his connection as chief counsel to the enforcement division. I read from an editorial which appears this morning in the Washington Post:

"PROHIBITION ANARCHY."

The statement issued by Alfred D. Van Buren in resigning his position as chief counsel to the Federal prohibition commissioner should serve as a warning to those in authority and cause them to stop and consider carefully the laws and regulations for enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. When Mr. Van Buren says "the country is drifting to prohibition anarchy" he makes a very important assertion, considering his opportunity to gain information.

Mr. President, I believe that newspaper has discharged a duty in carrying this item on its editorial page this morning. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, this one question is agitating the American people to a greater extent than that of any other of the issues which have been discussed in the Senate. There is no man or woman anywhere in the world in a better position to give an honest, sincere, and truthful opinion concerning conditions in the United States with reference to this particular measure than Mr. Van Buren, who was the chief counsel to whom all these laws were sent for interpretation and to whom all questions of violation were brought, who has resigned and severed his connection with that department and said the American people should take warning, because these laws are bringing about prohibition anarchy.

I fully agree with him in that statement for two reasons—because I think he is the best-equipped man to speak upon the subject, and because it has been in my opinion the tendency of the Government to restrict too much and to interfere too much with the rights of the people.

This opinion is held by some of our foremost citizens. In my State, Chief Justice Monroe, of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, our highest court, recently expressed himself in the public press as follows:

Be sure you do not misunderstand me. By no means do I favor the open saloon. I think to the extent that the eighteenth amendment drove from America the open saloon it is a good law; but when it went further and declared a citizen could not purchase a bottle of wine or beer to take to his home and drink there, to that extent it is an infringement upon the liberties of the people.

Justice Monroe has a record of 45 years of consecutive judicial service, 22 years of which he spent on the State's highest bench. He is the present chief justice, is vigorous, and one of the best jurists of this Nation.

The present law I would call the poor man's prohibition. There is not a village, town, or city in the United States where one with money need deprive himself of liquor. The fact that those with money can get all they want, while the poor man can not afford it and must do without it, has caused more discontent in this country than any other cause. Mr. Van Buren corroborates that statement. But the fact remains that many people who did not previously drink whisky are now drinking it. Millions are manufacturing it.

We know that conditions such as are recently reported in the New York Times as having been made by Mr. Don V. Parker, prohibition commissioner of Ohio, are the same in every State. Mr. Parker is quoted as saying that in Ohio two years ago there were less than 100 stills in operation, but he now concedes that a conservative estimate of the stills in that State would place the number at 50,000 active stills. He also admits that with only 200 breweries two years ago, there are now hundreds of thousands. The conditions in other States are not different from those reported in Ohio.

Prohibitionists are idealists who imagine that they can stop the drinking of alcoholic liquors altogether. In order to enforce laws that are too arbitrary and drastic they demand the appropriation of millions of dollars. But, Mr. President, Congress should understand that unless we liberalize the present law, no amount of money can enforce the law. If the Congress which is vested with the power to define what is an "intoxicating liquor" would so modify the law as to permit the use of beer and wine, the bootlegger, with his customary bad whisky and his often fatal poison, would immediately disappear, because most people would be satisfied with beer and wine at meal times and an occasional indulgence with their refreshing effect between meals.

Mr. President, while our people are groaning under extremely heavy taxes and we are devising new taxing schemes to levy taxes for the next year upon our already distressed people amounting to a per capita tax of $50 we should stop wasting the people's money on spies who, while enforcing the law as against the common people, are in too many instances cooperating with bootleggers and are making millions in the disreputable trade. Think of levying a tax of $50 for next year on every man, woman, and child, and then tell me if we should appropriate millions for officers who in many cases are parties to the violation of the law they are paid to enforce. Such a situation is a national disgrace and scandal. I would like to have the whole system of enforcement since 1919 exposed. The graft, murders, and other crimes committed since prohibition, to my mind, exceed all the crimes charged against liquor previous to prohibition.

Mr. President, I think it was for good democratic principle that our boys fought and died in the World War. Who dares deny the people of the respective States the right to govern themselves? Local self-government is the best yet devised. Under that imperishable principle we have grown strong, powerful, rich, and great. It is my opinion that we should permit the respective States to settle this vexed prohibition question. We should all be willing to abide by the wishes of the majority in our respective States. For that reason I shall propose a substitute for the present bill. Congress clearly has a right to say what is an "intoxicating liquor." I propose that we permit the people of the respective States, by referendum, to fix whatever alcoholic content it pleases, provided it does not exceed 5 per cent for beer, ale, and porter, and 14 per cent for wines. Of course, this could not affect the States that desire to continue bone dry, but it would give an opportunity to the people living in wet States to permit the legal sale, under State supervision, of beer and wine. Beer and wine, Mr. President, are never bootlegged around. They are too bulky for that purpose.

The effect of such a law would be most beneficial. We would all feel that we had had restored to us the absolute right to govern ourselves. People would decry the law much less, and those having the right to sell beer and wine would see to it that the illicit purveyor of bad whisky would be apprehended. It would, moreover, bring a very handsome revenue to the Government and the States which permitted the sale of beer and wine.

Mr. President, the Congress might just as well look upon the question in a practical way. Had it done so originally, I am sure that reasonable enactments would have had the support of many good citizens in its enforcement who now have perfect contempt for the present law on the subject and less respect for the Government. The Congress enacted the Mann Act, known as the white slave law. This law denounced the doing of that which is also denounced by the moral law. Have the large organizations back of the prohibition movement ever asked for a special bureau, with thousands of employees and millions of dollars, to enforce that law? I think not. There are statutes denouncing rape, murder, arson, and such other detestable crimes, which are crimes per se. Have these great moralists and uplifters ever asked for millions to enforce these laws? I think not.

Therefore, Mr. President, if it requires a large, special force to enforce the national prohibition act, it is because its terms are too drastic. Let us liberalize the law and there will be no more trouble. Let us return to the good democratic principle of local self-government. It is the anchor of our security and hope for future welfare and greatness.

Let us substitute for that bill one which I have taken from a bill introduced in the House by Mr. KINDRED, and which I send to the desk for the purpose of having printed and placed on the desks of Senators. I shall not read it at this time for that reason, but I introduce it and would like to have it printed and a copy placed on each Senator's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Without objection, the proposed amendment will be received, referred, and printed.

The amendment submitted by Mr. BROUSSARD, in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill H. R. 7294, supplemental to the national prohibition act, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

That section 1 of title 2 of the national prohibition act is hereby amended by adding at the end of said section the following:

"Provided, however, That the above construction of the word 'liquor' or the phrase 'intoxicating liquor,' so far as it relates to beer, ale, porter, and wine, shall not apply in those States which through a referendum vote shall adopt a different construction for the word 'liquor' or the phrase 'intoxicating liquor,' and any State may, through a referendum vote of the people, place such construction upon the word 'liquor' or the phrase 'intoxicating liquor' as shall not include within the operation of this act beer, ale, and porter up to 5 per cent alcoholic content by volume and wine up to 14 per cent alcoholic content by volume, and the Federal Government hereby concurs in such construction, said referendum to be placed upon the ballot at any special election for that purpose called by the governor of any State, or at any State or National election whenever the governor of such State, in his discretion, may so direct or whenever 15 per cent of the voters of such State shall so petition the secretary of state of such State at least 30 days before said election."

Mr. BROUSSARD. This is precisely the bill introduced in the House by Congressman KINDRED, except that 14 per cent is inserted instead of 10 per cent for wines. Many Senators representing dry States will not vote for this substitute, but what reason or excuse can they give to deprive people of other States of the right to have beer and wine or to say that a physician shall not, when necessary, prescribe more than a pint of whisky per 10 days? I hope at the proper time that this body will substitute the measure which I have sent to the desk for the one which has passed the House.

Senators, in conclusion I desire to say that my idea about this question is that it is impossible to enforce any such laws unless the great majority of the American people are in favor of them heart and soul, and are willing to denounce it as a crime in itself to drink a glass of beer or wine. If you come to the conclusion that you can liberalize this law, I am satisfied that every person in the United States will be actively at work to try to enforce the prohibition law; but, up to this time I think it has been a failure.

During Mr. BROUSSARD's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] having charge of the unfinished business if he would not be willing to lay it aside temporarily so that we can continue the consideration of the maternity bill. I wish to appeal to the sense of fair play of the Senate. The maternity bill over a week ago was made a special order of business for 1 o'clock to-day. I realize that Senators have to take chances under the rule. Upon my motion the bill was brought up for consideration a little before 2 o'clock, so that we had some time for its consideration; but the whole hour has been taken up in the discussion of another subject. It does seem that we ought to have an opportunity at least to have that hour for the consideration of the maternity bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not wish to interrupt the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

Mr. KENYON. I do not desire to do so either.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am disposed to withhold my answer to the request of the Senator from Iowa until after the Senator from Louisiana shall have concluded his speech.

Mr. KENYON. Very well.

After the conclusion of Mr. BROUSSARD's speech,

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair and announced his signature to the following enrolled bills, which had previously received the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

S. 1019. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish free transportation and subsistence from Europe and Siberia to the United States for certain destitute discharged soldiers and their wives and children;

H. R. 6652. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River in Muskogee County, Okla.; and

H. R. 6653. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at a point near Webbers Falls, in Muskogee County, Okla.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the bill under consideration, the unfinished business, to amend the interstate commerce act concerning the transportation of coal, is not, in my opinion, very important since the Interstate Commerce Commission, as I believe, has under existing laws the powers now proposed to be conferred, and a duplication will only bring about more or less confusion.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I desire to say that his opening statement is directly contradicted by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who has written a letter to the Interstate Commerce Committee stating that the commission do not believe that they have the authority at the present time.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is where the gentleman quoted and I differ, which leaves the matter just where it was.

There is another bill upon the calendar—Senate bill 1807, entitled "A bill to aid in stabilizing the coal industry"—also introduced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], to follow the pending measure, which is far-reaching in its many drastic provisions and of very great importance.

The provisions of Senate bill 1807 practically provide for governmental operation by departments here in Washington of the coal industry in the United States.

They establish a system of espionage upon and interference with the production, transportation, and sale of coal, which will deprive the owners of the control and free use of their properties and the employees of their freedom of contract and employment.

They will interfere with the domestic affairs and police powers of the States, and the administration of the system will call for appropriations to be paid by unwarranted taxation to maintain a large force of Federal employees.

There are other Senators who will analyze this bill and discuss fully the constitutional and economic objections to it. What I have to say will be directed against the general principles involved in legislation of this character, much of which is now flooding the Congress.

Mr. President, concentration of all the powers of government in the Federal Government at Washington, destroying and devitalizing the State governments, and paternalistic and restrictive laws hampering the rights of personal liberty, freedom of action and contract, and control of private property, are the greatest dangers which threaten our liberties and the perpetuity of our free institutions.

The people who settled the thirteen original States came from western and northern Europe, chiefly from Great Britain and Ireland, some from France, Germany, Holland, and Scandinavia. They were a sturdy, brave, indomitable, liberty-loving, and God-fearing people. They came for the purpose of enjoying personal liberty, freedom of worship, and becoming property owners and acquiring homes. They brought with them the great principles of local self-government, which their forefathers had exercised from earliest recorded history, and made them the foundation of the Commonwealths they established. They builded upon the great fundamental American principles of individual liberty, religious freedom, private property, and the enforcement of law. Theirs were "governments of law and not of men."

These inviolable rights and principles of government were reestablished by the War of the Revolution; they were proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence, and are preserved and guaranteed in our Federal and State Constitutions; they are the principles which distinguish the American Government from all other Governments of ancient and modern times. The American people, under their influence and protection, have become the greatest, the most powerful, the richest, and the most enlightened people in the world, and have transferred the seat of civilization and progress from the Old World to the New World.

We have no cause to fear a foreign enemy. There is no foreign Government that can conquer and subdue America. The whole world was astonished when in the recent war we raised and placed in the field armed and equipped for battle with ample supplies 4,000,000 men, transporting 2,000,000 of them 3,000 miles across the ocean, and provided a formidable Navy, all within a limited time. We so demonstrated our great resources of man power and wealth and our ability to marshal them when needed, and the splendid efficiency, fortitude, and courage of our soldiers, that no nation will ever dare attempt to invade our country or conquer our people. The dangers which threaten our institutions come, I regret to say, from forces within our gates.

When the American Colonies won their independence from Great Britain there were 13 separate, independent, and sovereign States. They were not separately strong enough to resist foreign foes, and, for the common defense and to promote the welfare of all, they formed a Union and created the Government of the United States of America, a Republic composed of sovereign States. They adopted a Constitution by which they delegated to the Federal Government all the powers necessary to carry out the purposes for which it was created, and by express provisions of that Constitution all other powers of government not so delegated, with certain restrictions, were reserved "to the several States and to the people." The powers of the Federal Government extended to all foreign affairs, the national defense, commerce between the States and foreign nations, with the power through Congress to legislate and impose taxes for these purposes. The States and their people reserved to themselves the power to control all of their internal and domestic affairs through and by their local governments, fully preserving the right of local and self-government which our forefathers cherished above all things. The proceedings of the constitutional convention show the determination of the several States that there should be no interference with the integrity of their governments in local concerns.

There are in the United States groups of men, some in high places, who would have all power concentrated in the Federal Government. They are the successors of the old Federalists, led by Alexander Hamilton, who would have destroyed democracy and government by the people but for Thomas Jefferson and his devoted followers.

There is no proposition to effect this concentration by constitutional amendment or direct legislation, but it is being effected by numerous measures assiduously and persistently pressed which inevitably will lead to the control of all local and internal affairs of the States and of the people by the Congress of the United States, exercised chiefly through the multitudinous departments and bureaus created and established at Washington, under rules and regulations made by them having the force of law, presided over by chiefs and clerks, in whose selection the people have no voice and who have no intimate knowledge of local conditions and the interests and necessities of the people, often acting hastily and unwisely and always autocratically. Laws are constantly proposed which, if passed, will collectively produce these intolerable conditions.

The States, if this continues, will gradually be deprived of all their powers and reduced to mere provinces or geographical divisions, with no more dignity or power than our counties, and sovereignty will have passed from the people. If these un-American and unconstitutional measures are not checked, the bureaus at Washington will be directing and controlling our schools, the marriage relations, boards of health and sanitation, internal commerce, banks, our markets, highways, railroads, and other public utilities, labor, industries of all kinds, primary and general elections, coal production, water-power development, and every other thing of local concern now legislated for by our general assemblies and regulated by our county and municipal authorities.

Bills are proposed and some put through Congress which years ago would have provoked protests from the governors, the general assemblies, and the people of every State in the Union because of their violation of the rights of the States. It is now for the people to determine whether they wish to maintain the State governments and the control of their local affairs through officers elected by and responsible to them or allow them to be usurped by the Federal Government and administered by appointed clerks unknown to them. I have no time to go into the details of these measures, but I have not exaggerated what is going on or what may eventually happen to our State governments and the people.

I do not mean to charge that the Members of Congress supporting these various and different measures have in mind the concentration of all powers in the Federal Government, but they must know the certain tendency of each separate measure, and that the inevitable result and effect of all of them will be the destruction of the States and local government.

There are now constantly proposed paternal laws and restrictions on personal liberty, business, and property rights which, if enacted, will destroy individual freedom of action and of thought, the characteristics that have marked our people from their earliest history, and without which civil and religious liberty can not survive. They will no longer be the sturdy, self-reliant, and independent people, thinking and acting for themselves, having convictions with the courage to maintain them, who threw off the yoke of the King of Great Britain and established this great and free democratic Republic in the wilderness.

These measures are generally sugar-coated with appropriations and ingeniously disguised in the clothing of something apparently beneficial, but valueless, without individual freedom and the right of people to govern themselves. They frequently disclaim interference with the powers of the States in the face of the fact that such interference is apparent and the measure would otherwise be inoperative. The argument generally made that a measure is meritorious affords no justification for invading the jurisdiction of the States. The States can exercise all powers vested in them. That they fail to do so is no excuse for usurpation. Neither neglect nor consent of the States can extend the powers of Congress.

These paternalistic and restrictive policies will also destroy individual initiative and energy which are so necessary to good citizenship and to free and independent government.

The great discoveries and inventions that have opened up new fields of improvement, elevated human thought and action, and advanced civilization have been made by the private judgment and creative power of bold and able individuals. There will be no incentive to industry and economy.

No nation has achieved greatness and prosperity which did not recognize the rights of private property. Civilization has been more than once almost destroyed by restriction of these rights.

No country, whatever its natural resources or the character of its people, can long exist without freedom of individual action and the protection of the right to acquire and enjoy private property, created by the industry and saved by the frugality of its people.

Destroy these rights and you abase the people and destroy the Government.

The whole can not be greater than its parts, and a nation can not be greater than the people who compose it. The final result of paternalism will be autocracy, despotism, tyranny, and anarchy.

Mr. President, the great corporations, public and private, should be confined in their activities to their corporate purposes and powers, and those whose business is of a public nature should be regulated to prevent injustice and oppression. All combinations in restraint of commerce and conspiracies to destroy competition and control prices should be suppressed and unfair practices in trade should be prohibited and punished. We have laws which are ample for these purposes, if vigorously administered, and which can be supplemented if necessary. I believe in these laws and their rigorous enforcement, but I do not believe in espionage and restrictions upon individuals in their private affairs and the shackling and embarrassment of the business of the country by commissions, bureaus, and insolent and autocratic agents. I want now to enter a solemn protest against all this iniquitous legislation.

It is a singular fact, Mr. President, that those who favor laws destructive of the powers of the States, wittingly or unwittingly, have adopted some of the same policies and sinister means which have been advocated for the overthrow of the sovereignty and independence of the Federal Government. It will not be out of place to refer to some of those policies.

There are some people in Great Britain who have never ceased to regret the separation of the United States from the British Empire; and wild and visionary as it may seem, they and some of their sympathizers in the United States still cherish the hope that we will return to British allegiance.

Cecil Rhodes, the great Englishman, who acquired fabulous wealth mining diamonds in South Africa and who brought a vast domain in that country under the dominion of Great Britain, had this dream and believed it could be realized. In his first will, made in 1877, he provided an enormous trust fund to be used in the establishment and promotion of a secret society for the extension of British rule, and expressly, quoting the will, "for the ultimate recovery of the United States of America as an integral part of the British Empire." You all know that he created a great trust fund to establish scholarships in English universities, through which a large number of American youths would there be educated, the real object being that they might be inoculated with British policies, including that of the extension of the British Empire to all parts of the world, which they are expected to advocate and work for final consummation when they return to America.

Andrew Carnegie, the great ironmaster, a British subject, who made hundreds of millions of dollars in this country and finally returned to spend much of it in Scotland, his native land, was in full accord with Cecil Rhodes in believing that British rule could again be extended over the United States.

In an article published in the North American Review for June, 1893, over his own signature, in furtherance of his desire for "British-American union," as this scheme has been styled, he wrote as follows:

> Let men say what they will, I say that as surely as the sun in the heavens once shown upon Britain and America united, so supely is it one morning to rise, shine upon, and greet again the reunited State, the British-American union.
> * * * * * * *
>
> National patriotism or pride can not prove a serious obstacle in the way of reunion.
>
> * * * * * * *
> All party divisions sink into nothingness in my thoughts compared with the reunion of our race.

Mr. Carnegie adopted the means of Cecil Rhodes for "the reconquest of America," and to carry out his desire to restore America to the British Empire created a foundation with the enormous trust fund of $10,000,000, yielding an annual income of $500,000, as a peace fund, established a discretionary endowment pension fund of nearly $20,000,000 for college professors, contributed to public libraries throughout the United States, and otherwise used his enormous wealth so that its influence might permeate every part of the country, the beneficiaries being expected to embrace and advocate his views.

These appeals of Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Carnegie to the cupidity of the professors of our colleges and the teachers of our schools and the aspiring youths of our country, like some now made by the new Federalist, offering bounties and scholarships, are an insult to their intelligence, love of individual freedom, patriotism, and their loyalty to their State and their country.

I do not believe that the people can be thus deceived and debauched. They will not sell their birthright for a mess of pottage. They are not mendicants, and seek not charity enforced by law.

Those who think must know that the proposed appropriations in various measures before Congress will be paid out of their own money collected from them by taxation. The Federal Government has no other source from which to obtain the money for these or any other purposes. The Federal tax collector is now too frequent a visitor at our doors. Again, taxation for such purposes is without constitutional authority and a usurpation of power.

Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Carnegie both gave as the moving object of the great trusts established by them the alluring cause of international peace, arguing that if all the English-speaking countries of the world were united into one great empire—of course, the British Empire—it would be so powerful and irresistible that it could command and enforce peace among all nations, and I may say a British peace for the advantage of British people and British commerce.

We all want the great English-speaking nations to remain on terms of the best of friendship. War between them would be horrible and is inconceivable; but we want no British-American union.

We all want peace and to alleviate the sufferings of humanity and promote progress and civilization, but we can not and will not sacrifice our traditions, our love and veneration for the valor and achievements of our forefathers, the form and the sovereignty and independence of our incomparable Government. Greater calamities than war can befall a nation.

A nation without traditions and without national pride and love of country can not long remain free and independent.

Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Carnegie, to their credit, proposed to use their own money in promoting British imperialism in this country, but those who would destroy the State governments propose to debauch the people with their money, wrongfully wrenched from them by increasing taxation, now almost too great for them to stand.

We owe equal allegiance to the Federal Government and our States. Their powers and jurisdiction are separate and distinct. There is no conflict in them. Each is supreme in its constitutional appointed sphere. We must uphold and support both with equal sincerity and loyalty. Those who would take away from the States their reserved powers are just as disloyal and unpatriotic as those who would favor a British-American union and the surrender of the sovereignty and independence of our country, and should receive the same measure of condemnation from the people.

There is but one calamity that can befall America greater than the practical destruction of the governments of the States, and that is the destruction of the Federal Government. Those who would strip the States of their constitutional powers do not seem to realize that they are destroying one of the fundamental and essential parts of our dual form of government. We can not have an "indestructible union of indestructible States" without the States.

Mr. President, we must love and defend our Constitution as we do our flag, for without the Constitution it must be hauled down. This great charter of our liberties should be better understood by our people; it should be studied in our schools and its provisions explained and impressed upon the young women and the young men of the country. Public speakers addressing commercial and business organizations should give it their attention. I do not believe there would be any impropriety in discussing it in the pulpit.

Cardinal James Gibbons, who for his piety, patriotism, and love of justice commanded universal respect, said:

> Next to the worship of God, no higher duty lies within the range of clerical obligations than that of stimulating patriotism, which consists of ardent love of one's own country and the protection and perfection of that country's policies and civil institutions of the willingness, in deed and eagerness, to maintain and perpetuate those institutions, if need arises, at the risk of and even the sacrifice of life itself.

The maintenance of the integrity of the Constitution is necessary to the preservation of the American Government, the great fortress of civil and religious liberty. When it falls, civilization and free government will perish from the face of the earth, and with it will go the Christian religion. Surely in averting such a calamity we serve God. I should like to see the American people united in their love and their defense of every line of the Constitution, as they are in every star and every stripe of their flag.

I believe in the integrity and permanency of our institutions, and that our Constitution will carry us through all the dangers that may threaten and all the assaults that may be made upon our country and Government. I have too much confidence in the patriotism and ultimate sound judgment of the American people to doubt this, but we must meet all the enemies of our Government under whatever guise they may approach us. It is just by such gradual and insidious means as those to which I have referred that Republics are destroyed, and free people lose their liberties.

Let us call a halt upon this course of demagoguery and usurpation and have the courage to go back to the Constitution and the Republic of the fathers.

PROTECTION OF MATERNITY AND INFANCY.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am going to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he is willing to lay aside the unfinished business in order to give the bill known as the maternity bill the fair opportunity which it impliedly, at least, should have had under the order making it a special order?

The entire hour under which that bill would have been considered as a special order was taken up by a speech on the Volstead Act. Of course that is permissible under the rules of the Senate, and I am the last one to complain; but I do suggest that where a matter is made a special order there is at least an implied agreement of fair play that there should be some consideration of the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, yesterday when the Senate adjourned I felt that we should have recessed, that this question of the coal bill should be settled, either that it should be defeated or that it should be passed. A great deal has already been said on the subject, and I think all that can be said has been said; but dragging along in this way is not my idea of legislation. If the votes in this Chamber are against this bill, let us vote on it, and either pass it or kill it, but let us have action.

I can not yield to the Senator from Iowa. I must object, and try to get a vote on the coal bill.

Mr. KENYON. When does the Senator expect to get a vote?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Last night I moved an adjournment in order that the Senator might have a chance with his special order to-day——

Mr. KENYON. The Senator realizes that I have not had that chance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And I am perfectly willing to-morrow to move an adjournment again in order that he may have another opportunity, but I must insist now that the Senate go on and attempt to decide whether they are going to pass this coal bill or defeat it. I think that is a consideration which is due me and due the committee of this body that I represent.

I know that there are certain Senators who wish to speak on the bill, and I have tried to arrange matters so that they would have the opportunity; but other measures have come up, routine business, and I have tried to be agreeable and yield to every Senator on this floor. I believe that this measure is of vast importance to the American people. I believe that it involves the question as to whether we shall have a supply of coal next winter or not. I believe that if these powers are promptly given to the Interstate Commerce Commission it will induce a movement of coal which will prevent a shortage next year. There may be others who disagree with me, but that is my belief from a study of the situation. Therefore I think that if we act we should act quickly and either pass this bill or defeat it, but not drag along with other matters, putting other measures—probably equally as important—ahead of it, but getting nowhere with this bill.

Therefore I am forced to object.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, of course, I can find no fault with the Senator; he is always fair. I think it would be fair that we be given the same status to-morrow, or even a better one, with this bill, in order to have a chance to discuss it. I hope the Senator will soon reach a vote on his coal bill. The movements are somewhat suspicious about it, and I doubt if he is going to reach it as soon as he expects, and the weather is not conducive to hurrying about a coal bill. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 1039 be made, under Rule X, a special order for to-morrow at 12.30 o'clock.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the request. I myself have had no opportunity to examine this bill, and I think there are a great many other Members of the Senate who have not. It is a bill that is somewhat revolutionary in its character. As nearly as I can catch the spirit of it from a hurried reading, it proposes that we shall go out to teach the women of the United States how to raise their babies, and do that through a Government bureau. There may be some merit in the bill, but I do not want to see a bill of that kind rushed through the Senate without consideration.

Mr. KENYON. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session.

Mr. REED. Yes; many bills have passed the Senate which never should have been passed.

Mr. KENYON. I am not asking to have it passed, but I am asking to have consideration of it.

Mr. REED. Here is the situation: We are driving along here with committees in session transacting the most important business, and at the same time we are driving along with legislation of a revolutionary character, and we are conducting business frequently with only a few Members of the Senate present, although nearly all of them would like to be here. To-morrow there is to be a hearing before the Finance Committee, at which the Secretary of the Treasury is to appear, and, I presume, advance his reasons for the bill that has been introduced which has to do with all our foreign loans, a subject of the utmost importance. I know the hearing will hardly be concluded by 12.30 o'clock; it is very likely to take the greater part of the day, and it may take all of the day. I want to be present at the hearing, and I am sure the other members of the committee want to be present, and I certainly want to be present when we take charge of the rearing of the families of the United States. I want to understand that scheme, and I hope the Senator will not ask us to come to a unanimous-consent agreement. I do not like to say that I will bar any request of the Senator——

Mr. KENYON. The Senator knows, I think, that the bill was made a special order for to-day. That does not mean a vote; it means a chance to consider it, and the time for the consideration of the bill expires at 2 o'clock, because then the unfinished business is taken up. The full hour to-day was taken up by a discussion of the Volstead Act. I simply say, as a matter of fair play, that we should put ourselves to-morrow practically where we were to-day. The Senator knows we are not going to push anything contrary to his desire. I do say that we are going to push this bill along with what reasonable speed we can, but we are not going to take from any Senator any rights. I am going to move to take it up every time I get the opportunity. I am going to try to have it made the unfinished business eventually.

Mr. REED. When the Senator gets it made the unfinished business, then, of course, we can all expect to be here; but I put the question about to-morrow morning. The Senator wants to have it made a special order for to-morro morning.

Mr. KENYON. I want to make up the time we lost to-day.

Mr. REED. And this committee meeting is coming on. Many Members of the Senate, I think 15, are on that important committee, and that is work which can not or ought not be neglected.

Mr. KENYON. There are other Senators who want to discuss the bill besides the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I want to hear the discussion. I really want to know why it is that——

Mr. KENYON. We have discussed that phase of it briefly this morning.

Mr. REED. I want to know why it is proposed to supplant the discipline of our mothers, or to teach the ignorant mothers of America how to raise their babies by a bureaucratic rule. I am interested in it. I may be wrong. I am always willing to be convinced.

Mr. KENYON. I have noticed that. All I am asking is that the bill be given the same status to-morrow that it had to-day. If the Senator wants to object——

Mr. REED. I do not like to object.

Mr. KENYON. I will move that Senate bill 1039 be made a special order for to-morrow, Wednesday morning, at 12.30 o'clock, and I shall take no advantage of the Senator if he can not be here.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I shall have either to ask for a roll call on the motion or make a point of no quorum. I ask for a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I inquire of the Chair whether a motion of this character, if it prevails, does not displace the unfinished business?

Mr. KENYON. Rule X expressly provides that it shall not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Chair will hear me just a moment, I would like to make a suggestion. Of course, the Senator from Iowa would have a right, under the rule, to move the present consideration of Senate bill 1039, the so-called maternity bill, and that would settle the question as to whether the Senate preferred to continue the discussion of the coal bill or take up the maternity bill. That motion would undoubtedly be in order. I say to the Senator from Iowa that if he will move to take up his bill in preference to the bill now pending in the Senate, for one, I would vote with him. So I am not adverse to his position. If he wants to displace the coal bill and take up his bill, I will vote to help him do it.

But it seems to me, Mr. President, when we have before the Senate the unfinished business after 2 o'clock, it is not within the rules of the Senate, or within the order, to stop the unfinished business to proceed to fix a date, by motion, for the consideration of other bills. Of course, it can be done by unanimous consent; there is no question about that; or it could be done in the morning hour to-morrow morning; but I do not see how we can take up a motion to give a calendar right to a particular bill in the midst of the consideration of the unfinished business without entirely destroying the unfinished business status, because if you can do it in one instance you can do it in others, and shortly the hour after 2 o'clock would become a time when Senators who desire to have special orders made would inject their special orders in the midst of the regular business of the Senate, and proceed to move the adoption of special orders when the Senate was considering its daily work.

I do not say that in opposition to the consideration of the bill the Senator is urging, because, as I said, if he will make a motion to take up his bill, I will vote with him to take it up now. But I do not like to see a precedent established which might seriously interfere with the business of the Senate in the future.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator from Alabama whether his willingness to vote to displace the coal bill is because he is opposed to the coal bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I may have a double purpose. I can assure the Senator, if he wants to know my attitude on the coal bill, that I think it is a very bad bill. I believe there is no doubt about that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I believe the Senator expressed himself in like manner yesterday.

Mr. KENYON. I make the inquiry if my motion is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion was made by the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from New Jersey having yielded. The Chair does not understand the Senator from Alabama raises a point of order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I ask a ruling on my inquiry, as to whether it will displace the unfinished business, in the opinion of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will come up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is it not the rule that a motion of this character, which is to take effect in the future, must lie over for one day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know any such rule.

Mr. REED. I do not care to argue it; I was merely making the inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under Rule X any subject may be made a special order by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present.

Mr. REED. The point I make is that the unfinished business being before the Senate, if this motion to take up another bill to-morrow morning is now entertained, it ipso facto displaces the unfinished business at this time.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there not an amendment to the bill now pending before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. STANLEY. I ask for a vote on that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, no point of order having been made.

Mr. KENYON. As I understand, the Chair has held that the motion I have made is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands no point of order has been made against it.

Mr. KENYON. I ask for a vote on my motion.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The ruling of the Chair is that if the motion prevails, and the order is given for the special order for the maternity bill to-morrow at 12.30, at the hour of 2 o'clock the unfinished business will be resumed under the rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that at 2 o'clock to-morrow, automatically, if the motion made now by the Senator from Iowa prevails, the unfinished business, which is the coal bill, will be laid before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Rule X provides for that.

Mr. KING. This bill can not, then, supersede the coal bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can not.

Mr. KING. May I inquire, Mr. President, if we took a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, what the effect would be? If we recess instead of adjourning, would not that recess carry with it the unfinished business, which would have the right of way not only at 12 o'clock, the hour to which the recess would be taken, but also at any subsequent period?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated the effect of the motion—that is, to give a right of consideration for the bill which the Senator from Iowa has in charge from 12.30 until 2 o'clock to-morrow, in case of adjournment; in case of recess the coal bill goes on as unfinished business under Rule X.

Mr. KING. May I inquire, Mr. President, if the business of the morning hour shall not have been completed at 12.30, if the motion of the Senator from Iowa should prevail, would it displace the business of the morning hour?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would depend upon the vote of the Senate. If it comes up that way and the Senate should want so to provide, they can provide it, and the maternity bill would displace the business of the morning hour.

Mr. KING. I had in mind, if the Chair will pardon me, this situation: Suppose we adjourn until 12 o'clock and convene at that hour and enter upon the business of the morning hour, and with due dispatch the business of the morning hour is proceeded with, when 12.30 o'clock p. m. shall have been reached, would the morning business then automatically be superseded if the motion of the Senator from Iowa were to prevail?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; it would. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], who is absent. I understand that if present he would vote as I shall vote on this matter. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MOSES (when Mr. KEYES's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. KEYES] on business of the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "yea."

Mr. MOSES (after having voted in the affirmative). Learning that my general pair, the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], has not voted, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. PHIPPS. I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], which I transfer to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] and vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am informed that if the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], with whom I am paired, were present he would vote as I would vote. I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (after having voted in the affirmative). May I inquire if the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have a general pair with that Senator. I do not know how he would vote on this question. I have no opportunity to transfer my pair with that Senator, and shall therefore have to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK].

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 4, as follows:

So Mr. KENYON's motion to make Senate bill 1039 a special order for to-morrow, Wednesday, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., was agreed to.

PEACE WITH GERMANY—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 42).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask to have the report of the conferees on the peace resolution printed. It must be taken up in the House first; it can not be taken up here until it comes to us from the House; but I should like to have it printed so that it may be before Senators and that they may see it before it is taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Let it also be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the conference report submitted by Mr. LODGE was ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 16) repealing the joint resolution of April 6, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist between the United States and Germany, and the joint resolution of December 7, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist between the United States and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with the following amendments:

On page 2, line 7, strike out the word "an" and substitute in lieu thereof the word "any."

On page 2, line 13, strike out the comma and substitute a period.

After section 4 add the following:

"SEC. 5. All property of the Imperial German Government, or its successor or successors, and of all German nationals which was, on April 6, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under control of, or has been the subject of a demand by the United States of America or of any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever, and all property of the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or its successor or successors, and of all Austro-Hungarian nationals which was, on December 7, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under control of, or has been the subject of a demand by the United States of America or any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever, shall be retained by the United States of America and no disposition thereof made, except as shall have been heretofore or specifically hereafter shall be provided by law until such time as the Imperial German Government and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or their successor or successors, shall have respectively made suitable provision for the satisfaction of all claims against said Governments, respectively, of all persons, wheresoever domiciled, who owe permanent allegiance to the United States of America and who have suffered, through the acts of the Imperial German Government, or its agents, or the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or its agents, since July 31, 1914, loss, damage, or injury to their persons or property, directly or indirectly, whether through the ownership of shares of stock in German, Austro-Hungarian, American, or other corporations, or in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war, or otherwise, and also shall have granted to persons owing permanent allegiance to the United States of America most-favored-nation treatment, whether the same be national or otherwise, in all matters affecting residence, business, profession, trade, navigation, commerce, and industrial property rights, and until the Imperial German Government and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, or their successor or successors, shall have respectively confirmed to the United States of America all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States of America during the war, whether in respect to the property of the Imperial German Government or German nationals or the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government or Austro-Hungarian nationals, and shall have waived any and all pecuniary claims against the United States of America.

"SEC. 6. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal, modify, or amend the provisions of the joint resolution 'declaring that certain acts of Congress, joint resolutions, and proclamations shall be construed as if the war had ended and the present or existing emergency expired,' approved March 3, 1921, or the passport-control provisions of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922,' approved March 2, 1921; nor to be effective to terminate the military status of any person now in desertion from the military or naval service of the United States, nor to terminate the liability to prosecution and punishment under the selective service law, approved May 18, 1917, of any person who failed to comply with the provisions of said act, or of acts amendatory thereof."

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the House amendment to the title and agree to the same, as follows: "Joint resolution terminating the state of war between the Imperial German Government and the United States of America and between the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government and the United States of America."

P. C. KNOX,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
STEPHEN G. PORTER,
JOHN JACOB ROGERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The joint resolution as thus agreed to by the managers of both Houses at the conference reads as follows:

"Senate joint resolution 16.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal coal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the pending amendment is an amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. I understand a similar amendment has been offered by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I asked the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the effect on this legislation of those amendments. I send to the desk a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, June 25, 1921.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: On your behalf your acting secretary has submitted amendments proposed by Senators STANLEY and KING to bill S. 1806, the seasonal coal rates bill, with request for our views as to the effect these amendments would have upon the bill and the purpose of the legislation. Reply is specially requested by Monday morning.

This matter has had consideration by the commission's legislative committee, and for the committee I am authorized to say that we think that these amendments are not in harmony with the purpose of the proposed legislation and that there are valid objections to the adoption of any of them.

The purpose of the legislation, as we understand it, is to promote continuous operation of coal mines, steady employment of coal miners, and economical use of facilities for distribution of coal by making lower rates for transportation during the months that are ordinarily dull months in the coal industry, thus relieving the pressure during the months when the movement of coal is active and transportation difficulties generally obtain. This purpose is economic. The theory of the legislation is that the lower rates during the dull months shall not be at the uncompensated expense of the carriers, but that the lower rates for the dull months and the higher rates for the more active months shall, as nearly as may be, bring to the carriers substantially the same revenue from this traffic that they would otherwise secure.

To that end we think that the purpose of the bill would be less clear and the legislation would be weakened if the words "greater or" were, as proposed in two of these amendments, eliminated from line 11, page 1 of the bill.

If all of that part of the bill after the word "periods," in line 1, page 2, to and including the word "designate," in line 7, were eliminated the purpose above referred to of according the carriers, as nearly as may be, the revenue on this traffic which they would receive but for the seasonal changes would not be reflected in the bill.

If from lines 2 and 3, on page 2, the words "yield as nearly as may be the same annual revenue for like movement as rates without seasonal variations" were eliminated and the words "increase the movement of coal and increase the revenues during such specified seasons or periods" were inserted in lieu thereof it would seem to imply that the commission would be authorized to initiate and adjust such rates only when in its judgment the movement of coal and the revenues of the carriers would be increased during the specified season or period.

The second amendment proposed by Mr. KING should, of course, be read in the light of the first amendment just referred to. If the proviso "That in cases where the reduction of rates for specified seasons or periods results in benefits or advantages to a carrier or carriers, such benefits and advantages shall be taken into account in fixing the rates for other specified seasons or periods" were added after the word "designate," in line 7, page 2, it would seem to indicate a purpose to have the seasonal rates and their effect considered with regard to individual carriers. This we regard as impractical. In the main, coal mines are grouped for rate-making purposes, and the rates are the same from all mines in the group and via all routes to the markets. Competition among coal producers and among carriers would not permit of lower rates via one line from mines served by it than via other lines serving other mines in the same group.

We think that the measure clearly announces the sound principle that should underlie the legislation and that the amendments above referred to will weaken or complicate the legislation and its administration.

EDWARD E. CLARK, Chairman.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, the communication which has just been read from the Interstate Commerce Commission is to the effect, and to the effect only, that in so far as this proposed legislation guarantees to the railroads a uniform return for the carriage of coal, it would to that extent be impaired by the adoption of this amendment. It may be true that to so amend the pending bill as to provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission, in order to stimulate the movement of coal, may lower the rate without giving it the corresponding right to raise the rate might in a measure affect the revenues of the roads. It is morally certain, Mr. President, that if the year is divided into two seasons, a summer season, when there is a light movement of a given traffic, and a winter season, during which there is a heavy movement of a given traffic, and a certain amount is taken from the charges allowed upon that traffic when it is light and is added on the traffic when it is heavy, the revenue of the carrier will be increased thereby.

The purpose of this proposed legislation is not to increase the revenue of the carrier. Nobody has argued that the proposed legislation is intended to enable the railroads to receive a larger return for the carriage of coal; nobody has argued that this legislation is initiated in order to guarantee to the roads the same return they now receive. The purpose of the proposed legislation is to move coal in the summer.

It is to give greater continuity of employment to coal miners; it is to give greater regularity to the business; it is to utilize the great number of cars that are idle in the summer; it is so to spread the load of traffic upon the roads as not to necessitate the appropriation of millions now provided for in the revolving fund for the unnecessary construction of additional freight cars. It is not denied—the Interstate Commerce Commission can not deny—that a seasonal rate will stimulate the movement of freight. The distribution of coal via the Great Lakes to points on Lake Superior and Lake Michigan is necessarily seasonal whether so provided or not, because the Lakes are frozen in winter; yet a reduction of 28 cents on the ton diverted to transportation by the Great Lakes 20,000,000 tons of coal which had hitherto been an all-rail haul, and a reduction of 50 cents a ton upon anthracite coal has resulted in the continuity of production and regularity of the distribution of that coal.

I am not here to inveigh against the railroads; I realize the condition in which they are placed; but this is not the time, this is not the psychological moment, for the railroads or those speaking in behalf of the railroads to say that the American consumer of coal must pay higher rates rather than risk the chance of having the revenues of the railroads impaired. As the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], with characteristic perspicacity, has so well explained to this body, the movement of the great quantity of bituminous coal is regular now. As he has stated, it goes to the bunkers of ships; to industrial enterprises; it goes to the movement of transportation, and is as regular as is business—practically the same amount in winter as in summer. There are a hundred million tons of coal used by domestic consumers in the United States; and this legislation is proposed for the purpose of helping the consumer. It is manifestly certain that, to a greater or lesser extent, the consumer will bear all the burden.

The only coal that is seasonal is the consumer's coal. The great ocean-carrying vessel does not consume materially less coal in summer than in winter. A mill or a factory or locomotive does not quit running in summer. It is the fire and the stove that stop. I have proposed here to prevent the raising of the rate to the woman who burns the coal in the stove and the man who burns it at his fireside. The answer to that proposition is not that it will not accomplish that, but that the Interstate Commerce Commission believes that it might affect a theoretical equilibrium, a guaranteed return to the road. Of course, if the Interstate Commerce Commission believes that it will reduce the rate to a point that would be confiscatory, it is within the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission not to make the ruling. It is not mandatory upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to do it.

However, I say that if we have to choose between the chance of lowering the rates to the railroads and the certainty of raising the rate upon the consumer, I will take my stand with the consumer, especially with the domestic consumer, and not only the domestic consumer but the poor domestic consumer. If this proposed legislation makes a material change in the cost of coal in winter or summer, the man of wealth who has the room and the money can buy his coal and store it, but the man whose $2 or $3 a day is spent the week that he earns it must buy his coal by the load or by the scuttle full.

What will be the result? Everybody who is in the business understands, the great coal yards of the country understand, that the coal disintegrates every time it is handled. When lump coal is worth $3 a ton slack is worth $1.50 a ton; that is practically the rate now. Every time coal is moved its value is impaired.

The great bulk of the coal of this country, over 600,000,000 tons altogether, will slack like lime to a greater or less extent when exposed to the action of the atmosphere. What would be the result when the great coal companies accumulate their stocks? They will figure on deterioration in their coal, because the coal is less valuable on account of the slacking process incident to handling and the action of the rain and the sun, and they will add that expense as an additional overhead charge to the cost of doing business. Then they will have to charge a higher rate in the wintertime, and, as Senators know, the dealer is certain to add to the winter rate, and so the consumer of the coal, when he buys it in the wintertime, will pay the increased rate because of the deterioration.

I heartily favored this proposed legislation when it was before the committee. I understood at the time, I will say in perfect candor to the able Senator who has it in charge, although he made no such contention, that it was a proposition by which rates might be reduced at certain seasons in order to induce the movement of coal. I never understood, I never dreamed, that it is what it is, a skillful juggling of the rates by which at a certain time if the coal is hauled a certain charge shall be made that is lower than the ordinary rate and at another time that the rate shall be higher, with the higher rate on the dense traffic and the lower rate on the light traffic. If this bill is not amended, it will raise the revenues of the roads. If it is amended, it may lower the revenues of the roads. I am delighted that the communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission has been read. I shall be delighted to see the Senate of the United States act on the clean, square-cut issue, whether in accomplishing the beneficent purpose intended by the bill, to furnish more coal in the summer time and greater continuity of service to the miner, they are going to give the benefit to the consumer or to the carrier.

Senators must remember that this bill is intended to accomplish another purpose. We have all noticed the relatively high wage that is paid to the coal miner, but that is nominal, not actual, because the man who maintains his family by digging coal, like the man who maintains his family by plowing the soil, must look to the return for the year. There is no such thing as regular employment in the average mine, for the reason that when the weather is warm and there is no demand for the coal, the miners are thrown out of employment. So they are paid a proportionately high wage during the time they are actually employed. The unemployment of coal miners, the long periods during which they are thrown out of employment by the fluctuating, seasonal, irregular demands have demoralized the business. These considerations have caused the miners of Great Britain to demand a 6-hour day and a 5-day week. They have brought before the English Parliament an act, now pending, to nationalize all the mines in Great Britain. If the movement of coal can be equalized, if labor can be employed with greater regularity, if the miner can be allowed to work six days in the week, he can afford to labor for a less return per day and still receive a greater remuneration at the end of the year. If what I have suggested can be brought about, it will lower the cost of production in the mines; it will lower the cost of transportation to the railroads.

Why should the railroads complain that their nominal return will be less? There are now over 900,000 coal cars, 300,000 of which are idle. It is admitted that the cost of maintaining cars idle on the sidings and in storage is greater than when they are in motion.

Any steel machinery, especially machinery with great numbers of wheels, rapidly deteriorates when it is not in use. You could take the spindles of a mill and leave them for a year, and you could not start your mill. There is a molecular change. More than that, an engine or a car left standing is subject to pilfering of its valuable bearings and all that sort of thing. Now, without another dollar of overhead charge, this amendment, if it acts as I think it will, will move 300,000 cars. It will give them the use of 300,000 cars for 12 months instead of for 6 months or 9 months; and if they get greater service from the car they should not complain at a slightly reduced charge for the service.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STANLEY. I do.

Mr. REED. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact, which is well known, that a railroad can operate its track, its cars, and its engines at much less cost in the warm months of the year than it can in the winter months.

Mr. STANLEY. I thank the Senator for the interruption. Cars are propelled by steam. Steam is the result of heating water, and the radiation from the iron boilers of a locomotive in the wintertime is enormous, entailing a greater use of fuel. As the Senator has well said, the cost in the summer time is less. They will be utilizing cars that are idle and do not cost them a cent; and, more than that, the railroads can figure and the Interstate Commerce Commission can figure, and if they believe that the reduction will amount to a confiscatory rate they need not make it.

These railroads can do this for the great corporations. Why can they not do it for the consumer? When the great railroad companies and the manufacturing companies that use this lake coal went to the Interstate Commerce Commission and got a seasonal rate, why can they not give it to Tom, Dick, and Harry to warm their bodies and cook their meals and wash their clothes?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in explanation of this bill and the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

The Senator says that he did not understand that this bill proposed a seasonal rate by having a higher rate in the winter and a lower rate in the summer. I do not know how a seasonal rate could be obtained unless you had a higher rate in the winter than in the summer.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, I meant, of course, a rate above the level rate—the flat rate.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well. I think the Senator is again mistaken. When the bill was originally before the committee and discussed day after day, it fixed the actual rates and specified the months in which the rates were to apply. The reduction in the months of March, April, and May was in the neighborhood of 25 cents a ton, running down to 5 cents a ton, I think, in July. The increases over the normal rate commenced with about 5 cents a ton and reached the neighborhood of 25 cents in November and December or in October and November—I have forgotten the exact months. I objected to those rates being stated in an act of Congress for many reasons. In the first place, the Interstate Commerce Commission is the proper body to fix the rates. It was impossible for Congress to judge exactly to what mining districts or exactly in what months the rates should be reduced, and how much, or whether they should be reduced an equal number of cents per ton in the summer and raised an equal number of cents per ton in the winter, because that would involve a corresponding expense of hauling in winter and in summer, and it would make an ironclad rule which would not be workable. Therefore the committee concluded that if this power was to be granted, assuming that it did not exist—I think it does exist and I will explain my views on that point—if the power was to be granted, it should be a power delegated to the commission so that the commission could take into consideration all the facts; and if the commission, by making an equitable and just rate, could increase the production in certain spring or summer months so that the coal mines would be run at nearer capacity and would employ their men more regularly, it would be beneficial. Nobody knows whether they can do that or whether it will work or not. The commission believes that it can be done.

Mr. President, I stated before the Senate and the committee that in my opinion the commission already has this power. The commission, or at least some of the commission, notably the chairman, who appeared before the committee, did not think that the commission had that power; at least, he was doubtful of it, because, as Mr. Clark said in substance, it would require the commission to take into consideration certain economic principles which were not proper factors in arriving at what a reasonably compensatory rate was. Now, I do not agree with the commission in that. I do not believe there is a rate fixed in the United States by the railroads or the commission where they do not, and do not necessarily, take into consideration economic conditions. Of course, they take into consideration primarily what is fair and reasonable compensation for transportation, but every rate is not made to be equally compensatory. That is impossible. They must of necessity take into consideration the nature of the traffic, and to some extent whether the traffic will prosper under such a rate, whether the traffic will bear the rate, the price of the commodity, the demands of the public, the prices, and so forth. All of these things must be taken into consideration by the commission in making rates.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask this question because I think the Senator perhaps is as well informed as any man upon the floor concerning the existing laws and concerning the existing powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Is it the fact—I may have misunderstood what the Senator said, and therefore I ask the query directly—is it the fact that what is now sought to be done by this bill is already a part of the law?

Mr. KELLOGG. In my opinion, the commission now have the power which this bill seeks to confer; but some do not agree with me, and the commission evidently does not agree with me.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. Just pardon me. Do I understand the Senator to suggest that in this intolerable weather we have been spending a week in passing what is already the law of the land?

Mr. KELLOGG. I realize that it is not a very pleasant time to discuss a coal bill, with the thermometer at the present point, but the Interstate Commerce Commission seem to be of the opinion that they do not have the power, and the majority of the committee were of the opinion that if they did not have the power there could be no objection to conferring the power upon them. I will say, further, that, of course, if the commission think they have not the power they would not exercise it, so that the committee thought it was perfectly proper to confer that power on them.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the Senator has answered me very fully. It is necessary to pass the bill, although they have the power, in order that the commission may exercise the power, because the commission believed they did not have the power?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is what they say.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Three times this question has been asked; and I want to say to the Senator from California that I would not compel the Senators to remain here and discuss this question if the Interstate Commerce Commission would act and if the Interstate Commerce Commission in their own opinion were empowered to make seasonal freight rates. I have repeatedly asked the Interstate Commerce Commission if they had the power. Finally, I asked them in a letter, and I received this reply from the chairman, and I think it should settle this question, which has been asked time and again, although the Senator has not been here, I believe, when it has been asked.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; the reason for my query was because the statement again was made, as I understood the Senator from Minnesota, and because of his expert knowledge, which probably exceeds or equals that of any other Senator upon the floor, I asked the question that I did.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am not a lawyer, and I do not know whether the Senators who have expressed themselves to the effect that the commission have this power are right or not; but I do know that the commission say that they have not the power, and that is their analysis of the law.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is correct.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will put this letter in the RECORD again, because I hardly believe that this legislation would have passed the committee and would have been before this body as long as it has if they already had the power.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, as I understand, the Senator disagrees with the opinion expressed by the Senator from Minnesota as to the commission having the power?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I most certainly do.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is perfectly proper that the Senator should.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (reading)—

> With regard to the commission's powers to prescribe seasonal rates, I have to say that we do not think that we have any powers to adjust rates for the purposes of securing or bringing about certain economic or industrial conditions which might appeal to our judgment. We think that our powers are to deal with the rates in the light of transportation considerations, with a view to avoiding or eliminating undue preference or prejudice and unjust discrimination as between persons or firms, localities or commodities. Our understanding of the purpose of the seasonal coal rate bill in which you are interested is that it recognizes a public interest and contemplates encouraging consumers to purchase their supplies in larger measure during the summer months, when the demand for coal is usually light and when the railroads have more than ample facilities with which to move it. We do not understand that it contemplates that this inducement shall take the form of reduced rates during the summer season wholly at the expense of the carriers, but that it shall be fairly compensated for in the rates applicable during the other months; in other words, that the total amount paid for transportation of coal shall be more evenly distributed over the months of the year without substantially affecting in this way the aggregate revenue of the carriers from this traffic.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota of course has no monopoly of knowledge of the interstate commerce act, and the Senator from Minnesota has had experience enough and is old enough to know that he may be mistaken. I simply expressed my opinion, because I believed the commission had a right to take into consideration, in making a rate, economic conditions; but the commission evidently is of the contrary opinion. Now, the railroads have not asked for this legislation. The commission has recommended it. Various people have asked for it, and others have opposed it, but no railroad company that I ever heard of appeared by representative or otherwise and asked to have any such legislation passed, and I have no knowledge or any desire on the part of the railroads for its passage. I believe that it is their opinion generally that the commission has full power now, but in that I may be mistaken.

It is the duty of the commission to fix a reasonable, just, nondiscriminatory and compensatory rate for hauling any traffic. Of course this has to be an approximation. There is no possible way of saying that coal or grain or cattle or fruit pays exactly its proportionate share of the expenses and profits to which a railroad is entitled. Some pay more and some less, depending upon the commercial conditions, the value of the product, and other elements which must necessarily enter into the making of a rate.

The commission was of the opinion that during certain seasons of the year, if it could lower the rates, it would tend to stimulate the production of coal and the transportation of coal during those months; the reduction was from 5 to 25 cents, although the commission might come to a different conclusion after a full hearing and increase them in certain other months.

The majority of the committee was of the opinion that it was well enough to give the commission that power if they did not have it, and for them to inquire into the subject and try to see whether the production and transportation of coal could be stimulated. I do not believe that it will make a penny's difference in the selling price of coal in the whole year. I doubt if it makes any difference either in the wintertime or in the summer time. It is a fact, of course, that at various times in the year cash coal is much cheaper than coal for future delivery.

In fact, when this investigation was on before the subcommittee and at the hearing before the full committee, it appeared that spot coal, as it is called, or cash coal, was selling in Indiana from 50 to 75 cents cheaper, and I do not know but what in some cases $1 a ton cheaper, for cash than it was for delivery in the fall and winter months. How much that stimulated the production and storage of coal, of course, I can not say. But it is manifest that if it is the duty of the commission, as near as it can, to fix a standard rate which for the year would be a fair compensation for handling the enormous coal traffic, then, if they reduce that rate in summer, if they still have a compensatory rate, it must be increased later to make it up. You can not equalize by simply reducing nor can you equalize by simply increasing. I do not assume that the commission would make an unreasonable rate in wintertime or permit an unreasonable increase of the price of coal by increasing the rate. I believe the commission would, as intelligently as possible, examine into the whole question, and they might find that they could increase the production of coal in the summer months by a reduction of the rate and therefore save the clogging of the railroads in the transportation of coal in the wintertime.

But I do not think that the amendment would carry out that purpose at all. Nobody would deny that the commission now can reduce a rate if it is too high; if they find a rate is too high in summer or winter, they can reduce it; they do not need any further legislative authority to do that. The question is, Do they need legislative authority to make a seasonal rate, to take into consideration economic conditions, the movement of traffic, and so forth, in the winter months?

I think, therefore, Mr. President, that anyone who opposes the bill on principle may have the very best of reasons, but I can not see why the amendment should be adopted, because nobody will deny that that power exists now. That is not a seasonal rate. If the rate is fixed at, say, 75 cents a ton or $1 a ton, and that is a reasonable, fair rate, of course, with 25 or 30 cents taken off it would not be a reasonable, fair rate.

It is true that the commission have made certain seasonal reductions on ratings. There is a seasonal rate in existence now to the Lakes of 28 cents a ton, because all coal must move up the Lakes in the summer time. It expires, I believe, in September or the 1st of October, I am not sure which.

I do not believe that the amendment, whatever Senators may think about the bill, ought to be agreed to, because I think it destroys the bill, and certainly renders it perfectly useless.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if there is no one else who desires to speak, I ask for a vote on the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, line 11, before the words "less than," strike out the words "greater or," and on page 2, line 1, after the word "periods," strike out the remainder of the clause in the following words: "but which in the judgment of the commission will yield as nearly as may be the same annual revenue for like movement as rates without seasonal variation, to be maintained by carriers as a whole or as a whole in each of such coal rate groups or territories as the commission may from time to time designate for that purpose, or by such carrier or carriers as the commission may designate." So as to read:

> (19) In order to promote continuous operation of coal mines, steady employment of coal miners, and economical use of facilities for distribution of coal, the commission is hereby authorized to initiate, establish, approve, or adjust rates for the transportation of coal during specified seasons or periods which shall be less than the rates for other specified seasons or periods.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I wish to reserve a vote on this amendment when the bill reaches the Senate.

[Mr. REED addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, at the close of the eloquent remarks of the Senator from Missouri, I wish to insert in the RECORD a statement by him, which is found on page 171 of the hearings before the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate on the bill relative to the publication of information concerning the production of coal and the profits of the coal industry. The Senator has attacked Senate bill 1807, the bill which provides for publicity in the coal business, and I desire to read from his statement on the occasion referred to. In that hearing the Senator from Missouri, interrogating a witness during the course of the hearing, said this:

Senator REED. I want to come to the question of costs as a separate matter. I want to see, if I can, how far the coal men of this country feel like cooperating in trying to remove the condition which you say is at times burdensome and which we regard as burdensome. I want to see how far you are willing to cooperate to remove those difficulties. My question thus far has not concerned itself with the question of costs at all.

Mr. MORROW. I understand, Senator.

Senator REED. I have asked whether you would be willing to have a law passed requiring the furnishing of the very kind of information that you were collecting voluntarily and distributing publicly, namely, the statement of the production of the mines and the price charged at the mines. I have not dealt with costs yet. Are you not willing that a law of that kind should be passed, and are you not willing to comply with it?

Mr. MORROW. Senator, if you could stop right there and go no further I do not think you would have a bit of trouble in this industry.

Senator REED. I say this as a lawyer, that I have not any more doubt about the right of the Federal Government to require that sort of information than I have doubt of the right of the Federal Government to take the census. This is only census business. It could be applied to every industry in the United States, and probably with great profit to the people. I have not the slightest doubt of it. It has not anything to do with running your business. It simply has to do with the question of reporting actually what has been done with reference to production and the charge that is made for the thing produced.

Then, further, on pages 637 and 638 of the hearings, referring to the bill introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and particularly to that part which relates to the compulsory publication of prices, the Senator from Missouri, addressing the Senator from New York, said:

Senator REED. Now, Senator, I have said in the early days of this hearing that I have no doubt that notwithstanding any action of Congress, that there was lodged somewhere in the Federal Government the ability to get the facts with reference to the commerce of the United States, and I will go just as far to help pass legislation of that kind, not only with reference to coal but with reference to every line of business, as anybody can go, keeping, of course, within our just rights and our powers. I think the power exists. I think the case that I examined the other day clearly outlines the way in which we can get it. Now, there can not be any dispute about that, and as for those features of the bill, I am heartily for them.

Mr. REED. What is the object of putting that in? That is what I say now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My object in putting it in is to show that the Senator from Missouri favored the bill of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] as far as the informative features were concerned, which is exactly what my bill provides.

Mr. REED. There are so many differences that I will not stop to discuss them now.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 29, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 28, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Jehovah, Thou art the Rock of Ages and our Heavenly Father, clothed in garments of infinite light, majesty, and power. Great is the Lord and greatly to be praised in the mountain of His holiness. Thou art our God forever and ever, and will be our guide even unto death. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONVENTION OF DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS.

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the Huose for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Speaker, there is formally opened today in the city of Detroit the first annual convention of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War. Every member of this organization either has shed his blood upon the fields of battle in France or otherwise has contributed of his physical well-being upon the Nation's altar. In announcing this convention, I do so not primarily for the purpose of inviting the Members of Congress to attend. It is my thought that we can be of greater service to the disabled veterans here than by making speeches or promises to them upon the stage of their convention hall. It is my purpose rather to invite the attention of Congress to the proceedings of this convention and to the program of legislation which may be indorsed by it.

Whatever may be said of the treatment or the lack of treatment which has been accorded to our wounded heroes in the past, let us have them know that, at the present moment, Congress is keenly alive to the value of the service that they have rendered and to the sufferings they have undergone, and that in the future the Congress will always have a sympathetic ear and be ready to respond in action to the appeals that may be made by the disabled and wounded veterans of the World War. [Applause.]

PATRICK H. KELLEY,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
WILL R. WOOD,
JAMES F. BYRNES,
W. B. OLIVER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the report which has just been read by the Clerk is signed by all the managers on the part of the House and by Senator POINDEXTER and Senator SWANSON on the part of the Senate. The omission of the name of Senator HALE was due to the fact that the Senator was temporarily absent at the time the report was signed, and he supposed that he had left authority with Senator POINDEXTER to sign his name to the report. The absence of the name does not indicate any objection to the report.

I would like to make a short statement, Mr. Speaker, in reference to the report. The bill as it left the House carried in round numbers $396,000,000. The Senate added, in round numbers, $98,000,000, making the bill as it passed the Senate $494,000,000. The conferees on the part of the House have agreed to two additions, amounting to $6,330,540, which, added to the $396,000,000 carried in the House bill, makes a total of $402,330,540, or about $92,000,000 below the amount carried in the Senate bill.

There are certain amendments which involved the expenditure of money and which the conferees on the part of the Senate informally agreed to, if the House should make the additions, which would make $11,956,501 more. So that if all the propositions involving the expenditure of money which will be before the House under the items that are in disagreement should be added to the bill by the House itself the total of the bill would be $414,287,000, which would be something over $81,000,000 less than the Senate bill carries and about $80,000,000 less than the expenditures for the current year.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Has it not come to pass that the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol, in order to finally get through the things that they do insist upon, do like these bureau chiefs in making estimates, namely, put on more than they expect to be agreed upon finally by the House conferees, and in the final unscrambling usually get what they want anyway?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Well, I will say to the gentleman from Texas that out of the $98,000,000 which was added by the Senate the House conferees agreed to $6,330,000. The reason for the increase of $6,330,000 was the agreement reached by the conferees on the part of the House and the Senate for an increase of 6,000 men in the Navy and 1,000 men in the Marine Corps over the 100,000 for the Navy and 20,000 for the Marine Corps as carried in the House bill, and an item of $800,000 for Key West, and an item of $100,000 for dredging in New York. Those, as I recollect, were the only three items which the conferees upon the part of the House agreed to. The 6,000 men which the House conferees agreed should be added to the 100,000 that the House provided for is just about a sufficient number to take care of the Aviation Service.

So that the bill as it now stands carries 100,000 men exclusively for the Navy and about 6,000 men for aviation. The Marine Corps has usually had one-fifth as many men as there were in the Navy, so we added a thousand men to the Marine Corps, keeping the percentage the same as has been maintained for a number of years.

UMI

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. In order to be accurate, I understood that the 6,000 over and above the 100,000 which the House authorized would care not only for aviation but also for the radio service.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes. I thank the gentleman very much. It will carry not only enough for the Aviation Service but for the radio operators.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. How much is set aside by the various committees for aviation? How much by the Navy and how much by the other services?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am not able to inform the gentleman beyond the amount carried for the Navy.

Mr. DUNBAR. What is the amount carried by this bill?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The amount carried by this bill is the same as when the bill passed the House.

Mr. DUNBAR. How much is that?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Nearly $7,000,000.

Now, just a word about the personnel. There was a marked difference of opinion between the House and the Senate as to the number of men necessary to maintain the ships in operation that the Navy Department thought ought to be kept in operation. The conferees on the part of the House believed that 100,000 men were sufficient.

The conferees on the part of the Senate insisted upon 120,000, and their judgment had the backing of the Navy Department Of course, the number of men required for the Navy is not an exact science, and we went into the matter with a great deal of care to determine where the men were stationed, what ships were kept in commission, and whether or not the defense of the country would be in any way impaired by reducing the personnel to 100,000.

I think the House will be interested in this analysis. Men would not care to vote for a reduction in the personnel if that reduction would impair the national defense. We found, as of April 1, in addition to all the fighting ships and ships necessary for the maintenance of fighting ships, that there were in commission at that time 27 old vessels, for which the Navy Department did not make any estimate for next year. No men were evidently expected to be used next year on those ships. Those were old ships, some of them having been gotten during the Spanish-American War; vessels of practically no military value; but they are now in commission and have on board 4,060 men. Of course, during the war we put into commission practically everything we could find that would float for the purpose of hunting submarines, and the Navy Department has put hundreds of these out of commission. But it is pretty difficult to get rid of them all promptly, and there still remain in commission large numbers of small craft of no military value whatever. They should be speedily put out of commission, as is undoubtedly the intention of the Navy Department.

There are 170 small yachts, submarine chasers, and other small craft that were designated as district craft and on those there are 2,988 men. We did not have these yachts and sub chasers before the war, but during the war they were built or purchased and put in operation, and naturally the ax has not been applied quite freely as to them—they eat up 2,988 men. We have eight or nine old battleships that the boys are using at the Naval Academy on their cruise. These will go out of commission when the boys get back to the academy, and there are 3,306 men on them. So that if these 27 old ships about which I have spoken and these sub chasers and yachts and other small craft and the old battleships were put out of commission, there would be released for other ships about 10,000 men.

The Navy Department figured that there would be required next year in the training schools as many as they had last year—14,674—but in all human probability the number in the training schools will be reduced 4,000 or 5,000 below that figure for this reason: The conditions in the country industrially are not the best, and since the war we have disenrolled over 500,000 boys who had actual war training of four months to four years. There are 500,000 or 600,000 men in the country to-day who have had training in the Navy, and out of that 500,000 or 600,000 at a time of industrial depression there is no trouble in replacing those whose enlistments will expire. These will not need to be trained, so that the number that the department figures for training stations was unnecessarily large.

Again, the department estimated that it would require 10,079 men on 175 destroyers to be kept in reserve. We have something like 300 destroyers. On April 1 last we had 122 destroyers in commission, and it is not expected that more than that number will be in commission the coming year. The conferees did not see the necessity of keeping 57 men on board a ship in reserve whose complement was only 114 men, and in making inquiries of naval officers the conferees found that in many cases one crew was being used with satisfaction to take care of four destroyers in a group, so that there would be only 25 or 30 men required on a destroyer in reserve instead of 57. This would make a difference of between 4,000 and 5,000 men who could be assigned to other duty.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. In the course of the committee hearings the fact was brought out that they had a number of ships not needed. Under existing law, if the Secretary wanted to dispose of the ships, it was necessary to have them surveyed, as it is called, and have them denounced as unseaworthy before the Secretary would have authority to dispose of them. The effect of that in advance is practically to discount and disparage very materially the value of the ships. Would it not be well for the gentleman to ask unanimous consent of the House for the conferees to write an amendment to one of these provisions which is still in conference, giving power to the Secretary of the Navy to dispose of ships not needed and of no value to the Navy, without going through this process of practically destroying their market value by disparaging it?

Mr. BUTLER. The Committee on Naval Affairs is considering that subject now. If the gentleman wants to legislate here without consideration, all right.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee is now under consideration by the Naval Committee and is worthy of serious consideration by that committee and the House.

Mr. BUTLER. I asked the Secretary of the Navy to look around where he might sell enough ships to amount to $7,000,000, and he could not find them.

We have not any to sell that are worth selling. However, the propriety of advising the Secretary of the Navy to sell the old stuff for what he can get is being considered by our committee and we hope it will be acted upon favorably.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The point I want to emphasize in discussing this proposition is that in fixing the number we thought sufficient at 100,000 men for the Navy we did not feel that we were in any way reducing the naval defenses of the country. What I want to impress on the House is that the reduction the committee made from the number now in the Navy to 100,000 could be easily accounted for upon old ships which should be put out of commission.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. While the gentleman is on the question of enlisted personnel I want to ask one or two questions to get the matter into the RECORD. As I understand it, the basis for enlisted personnel is founded on the tonnage of the Navy. Is that correct?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No; the enlisted personnel is based on the number of ships which the Navy Department thinks necessary to be kept in commission plus the number required for other activities necessary to sustain the ships.

Mr. McKENZIE. But the real basis, however, is tonnage, and the commissioned personnel in the Navy is based on the number of enlisted personnel. In other words, there is a certain percentage of commissioned personnel in each grade.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman is not quite correct. The officer force of the Navy is not based on the enlisted strength of the Navy, but on the authorized strength which is fixed by law. As I recall, that is 137,431. So that whether we have 100,000 or 105,000 in the Navy would not make any difference in the number of officers in the Navy, nor would it make any difference in the number of officers of any grade.

Mr. McKENZIE. I understand. What I want to bring out, if I can, so that we can have a clear understanding, is the fact that the enlisted personnel in the Navy is supposed to be founded on the tonnage of the Navy, and then the commission personnel is based on the authorized enlisted personnel of the Navy, and at the present time the commission personnel in the Navy is in accordance with the authorized strength provided by law.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is right.

Mr. McKENZIE. Therefore, reducing the enlisted personnel will not reduce the commission personnel, but you will have an officer overhead something like we have in the Army.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is right.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not the pressure come in the Navy by the way of battleships, because every time you build a battleship you increase the tonnage and you furnish an argument for the increase of the enlisted personnel, that being based on the tonnage, and does not that form a circle that brings pressure to bear on Congress?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. There may be something in what the gentleman says, but at the present there is no such pressure, because the battleship construction has been fixed.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to ask two or three simple questions which ought to go into the RECORD. How many men would it take to man every ship in commission?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Every ship that is in full commission at the present moment? They have 120,000 men in the Navy now. I think about 60,000 of these men are on the ships and the balance are in training schools, in radio or aviation, or some other shore activity.

Mr. MADDEN. It will take 60,000 men to man the ships in commission.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And let me say, in addition, there are a large number of ships which are not kept in full commission, but which are kept in reserve, and when you keep ships in reserve you must keep them in condition. That takes a considerable number of men, sometimes 30 per cent of the complement, sometimes 40, sometimes 50. It is not an exact percentage; it depends on the character of the ship, its value, and the age of it.

Mr. MADDEN. What I am trying to get at is this: There are 60,000 men on the ships in commission, and how many are in training schools?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It is not possible to state any fixed percentage. In the old days when we had four-year enlistments only one-fourth of the enlistments expired annually. Congress changed the four-year enlistment a few years ago to two years, so that one-half of the Navy enlistments expire every year. Under these conditions the percentage in training, all other things being equal, would be higher than when we had four-year enlistments. So, I doubt if you can fix any definite percentage that should be kept in training schools as compared with the number in the Navy.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose you have 60,000 men necessary to man the ships in commission, would there be any difficulty along with 40,000 additional men to take care of all the ships laid aside?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The committee thought that would be sufficient.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any doubt about it?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Not in the minds of the conferees on the part of the House. But the gentleman knows that when you go into conference with another body there must always be a disposition to give and take. In this case the conferees on the part of the House fully appreciated the wish of the House in this matter, and I fear carried our insistence to the very limit. We agreed to less than $7,000,000 out of $98,000,000 added by the Senate.

Mr. MADDEN. Unless it becomes disagreeable, sometimes it does not become effective.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is very true.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the gentleman from Michigan some questions.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. Did the gentleman discover how many capital ships the department proposes to keep in commission?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Fifteen.

Mr. BUTLER. And how many destroyers?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. One hundred and twenty-two.

Mr. BUTLER. How many for the capital ships?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Eighteen thousand one hundred and forty.

Mr. BUTLER. How many for the destroyers?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Ten thousand five hundred and sixty.

Mr. BUTLER. How many capital ships did you authorize them to keep in commission?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Fifteen.

Mr. BUTLER. How many destroyers?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. One hundred and twenty-two.

Mr. BUTLER. How many men for the two services, the capital ships and the destroyers?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Twenty-nine thousand.

Mr. BUTLER. Tell us what they are going to do with the remainder of 106,000 men, if you please.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Of course, there are a number of other craft that must be kept in commission that go along with these ships which my friend from Pennsylvania has named, and then there are certain other fighting ships that have to be kept in reserve.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, I know that; but is it not a fact that only about 33 per cent of our men are kept on these capital ships and these destroyers? That is what the percentage used to be.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think that is about correct.

Mr. BUTLER. About 33 per cent?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Then, there are the submarines, over a hundred of them, but they do not take a very great number of men.

Mr. BUTLER. As a sample, just as a mouthful, will the gentleman tell me where is the Olympia, Dewey's flagship of 1898?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman's question indicates that he and I are in perfect accord.

Mr. BUTLER. Where is the Olympia?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I do not know where she is just at the moment, but I think she is in the Pacific; I think at Bremerton.

Mr. MERRITT. She is at Puget Sound.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Possibly she has come across.

Mr. BUTLER. How many men have they on the Olympia?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. They have 352 men on the Olympia. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that these old craft which I have mentioned, and some others, could with great propriety be put out of commission; and if the gentleman will permit a suggestion, which I know he will, I do not know of anything which would save more money for the Government than for some committee of Congress—I will not undertake to say what committee—to make an inquiry into the ships of the Navy with a view to putting out of commission all useless craft.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman undertake that inquiry? I know if that inquiry is made this House can save at one stroke $50,000,000. It is not up to me to do it. It is probably up to the Committee on Appropriations. I will say this to my old friend, that I am perfectly willing to join him in making this examination and report to this House, ship by ship, and the character of the ships and the number of men they have on them, and to ask the department to remove the men from these old ships. But what authority has the Naval Affairs Committee to make that examination? It is up to the Subcommittee on Appropriations. It all comes back to the gentleman's subcommittee.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, it seems to me that is a matter that his committee could inquire into with great propriety, and that it is the duty of his committee to make that inquiry.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I am obliged to him for the compliment that he pays the Committee on Naval Affairs, but I am not going to accept his suggestions as to the duty of our committee, for we understand what is necessary for us to do. I certainly am perfectly willing to join with my former colleagues on this committee in making this examination, for the very purpose of saving to the American people millions upon millions of dollars every year in these appropriations, but I would certainly expect Gov. KELLEY and Mr. OLIVER, who sat with us so many years, to join with us in making this examination.

Mr. OLIVER. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my good friend Mr. BUTLER, and his committee need any aid. He has stated to the House that his committee is now considering a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to dispose of ships no longer needed by our Navy, and I assume it would be perfectly pertinent to that inquiry to find how many ships we can wisely and safely dispose of, and the House will await with interest a report from the committee on that matter.

Mr. BRITTEN. What good would it do to report, if they could not get a rule for the consideration of their recommendation?

Mr. BUTLER. I will ask my friend from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] a question. Would he suggest that we compel the department to sell certain ships or would he leave that to the discretion of the department?

Mr. OLIVER. I think it should be left to the sound discretion of the Secretary of the Navy—simply give full authority—but you could with propriety indicate what ships you feel could be safely disposed of.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman join in this investigation?

Mr. OLIVER. I will be very glad to.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] and I are in perfect accord as to the propriety of putting out of commission a large number of these worthless ships, and the reduction in the personnel of 14,000 men which has been made in this bill is made on that basis, and will not in the slightest degree reduce the military strength of the Navy below what it is at the present time.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MACGREGOR. If $50,000,000 can be saved, and it is within the knowledge of the Members of this House who have charge of those matters, why should we stand on the matter of ceremony? Why do not these gentlemen get busy and save this money?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The administration of the Navy Department is in the executive branch of the Government. A new administration has just come in, and we hope at least that it will be able to effect these economies. It is a matter of administration. We have withheld the men from these ships that have been spoken of and have made other cuts below the amounts being spent this year. We are saving upward of $80,000,000 over the current expenditures and are more than $80,000,000 under the Senate amendments. So we have made a fairly good start.

Mr. MACGREGOR. The people are looking to Congress to reduce expenditures.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I hope they will not be disappointed.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I just want to say, in reply to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has said, that I think he has given a revelation to the Members of the House. A great many of us are not in position to find out just exactly the number of battleships in and out of commission and the number of men stationed on them. He has made the startling announcement that this Congress is in position to save the Government $50,000,000, and I think that his committee owes it to the Congress to proceed at once and make that investigation and report to the House, so that those of us who are in favor of economy will have the privilege of showing to the country that we are determined to practice it wherever it is possible. Here is a splendid opportunity to decrease our heavy burdens. Let us have the investigation.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Of course, the gentleman's statement of $50,000,000 was approximate, no doubt, but what the gentleman from Pennsylvania meant and what I meant is this: That if you would tie up or sink or sell for junk certain old vessels running into the hundreds you would not in any way reduce the military strength of the Navy and you would save a good many millions, and I would not be surprised $50,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman from Michigan think there is any military value in the Olympia, Dewey's old ship?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Very little.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman give me a minute?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to state to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE] that I mean just what I say—that there is the biggest opportunity in the wide world to save money, if these examinations are made, if these investigations are concluded, and to show this House where the money goes, the places where it goes, and where it ought not to go, in my judgment. This country has started in to manufacture for the Navy.

Does the gentleman know that they started a $34,000,000 armor-plate factory, and how much armor plate does the gentleman think they are going to make? Does the gentleman know the amount of money that has gone into Nitro, W. Va., for an armor-plate factory? Does the gentleman realize what the Government has been doing for 10 years in the way of injecting itself into private business? I would go further in this examination than the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], our leader, suggests. I would go to the very bottom.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the Nitro, W. Va., plant is a war plant, is it not?

Mr. BUTLER. What does my friend call a war plant? Does he call a $34,000,000 permanent plant a war plant?

Mr. MADDEN. It was not started until the war, was it?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; it was authorized before the war.

Mr. BUTLER. It was authorized in 1914.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope we will leave this investigation entirely within the hands of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], because he can attend to it without creating 8 or 10 or 15 or 20 or more $15,000 jobs.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman tell us something about Key West? That is of great concern to me. I would like also to ask the gentleman whether or not he realizes what the pressure is from Key West to induce this Congress to spend $2,000,000 for waterworks there. The gentleman has agreed to put up this breakwater or to continue it, and in my judgment it is better to let the winds of the ocean sweep it away than to continue it and finish it and then come to Congress for $2,000,000 for waterworks. I would never consent to it if I had my way about it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the other item to which the conferees agreed, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has suggested, is the item respecting Key West, and it was with a good deal of reluctance I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we agreed to it.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know how the gentleman could change.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And yet I am inclined to think that even my friend from Pennsylvania would not have done differently, and I shall state the reason why I think so. This project for Key West was authorized in 1918. It never has greatly impressed me as being the proper place for a submarine base, but the naval people seem to think that it is a proper place; $1,100,000 have been expended there under the contract in dredging the harbor to form a breakwater.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. In a minute. About $750,000 is obligated under the contract. The contract is in process of execution. To make the breakwater a success and prevent the waves from washing the mud back into the basin, it is said that it must be covered with marl, which is found in that region; that that is the way the railroad company down there was able to handle its public works. It is claimed that it will be a success, and that when the mud pier or breakwater is covered with marl it will form a permanent breakwater.

Mr. MADDEN. That means that it will cement.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. We have agreed to this with an amendment providing that if the Secretary of the Navy finds that this project can not be made permanent by the expenditure of this sum of money, then it is not to be expended, but the work shall stop and the contractors will have to recover whatever damages they may sustain by reason of the cancellation of the contract. We think the course to pursue is to put this money in the hands of the Secretary, to be used to finish the contract in case he finds it can be done successfully, and, if not, to suspend work entirely, in which case the waves will wash the breakwater out of existence entirely in the course of a month or two.

All things being considered, we thought that pending the time the Naval Committee could make inquiry into this project and determine whether any further development should be made at this point, we should at least preserve the investment of $1,000,000 which had already been made and not allow it to be destroyed by the waves during the course of the next month or two.

Mr. BUTLER. But what are we going to do with it when it is done?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman from Pennsylvania at any time can bring in a bill discontinuing this project or——

Mr. BUTLER. What are we going to do with the thing when we get it finished?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I do not want it.

Mr. BUTLER. In the gentleman's judgment, does the Government want it?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I have never been in favor of it.

Mr. BUTLER. Where will you get the fresh water at that point?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. This is a project that is authorized by the Congress. The Naval Committee of the House reported this bill in 1918.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, yes; it authorized it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think Mr. PADGETT, chairman of the Naval Committee, reported it; it never appealed to him much, and yet it was put through, no doubt upon recommendation of the Navy Department.

Mr. BUTLER. In 1918, when we had the war fever on and when we gave everybody everything.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. So there was very little else, in my judgment, for the conferees to do.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I confess I am not criticizing my old friend, but I asked the plain question, What will the Government do with this thing when it gets it finished and then how much more money does the gentleman know that this Government will have to expend in order to use that place at Key West?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman knows perfectly well that no money can be expended at Key West for further development so long as he is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs unless he approves of such expenditure.

Mr. BUTLER. No; that does not follow.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Unless he brings in a bill to that effect.

Mr. BUTLER. I will never bring one in.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the Key West project, it should be borne in mind that Secretary Meyer during that administration appeared before the Committee on Naval Affairs several times, and in his annual report and personally before the committee urged the necessity and demanded that this project should be undertaken by the Congress and that it should be carried on on a larger scale, involving a much larger appropriation than the Committee on Naval Affairs has heretofore or up to this time provided.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with my friend. Secretary Meyer was a Republican and Secretary of the Navy, and he spoke to me about it. I said, "I will not vote a dollar for that sink hole there now for you or anybody else."

Mr. PADGETT. The committee had hearings and a full investigation, and then Secretary Daniels took it up, and it was backed by the naval people, and all the strategists agreed that the Caribbean Sea will be the area of a war if we are ever engaged directly in a war, and that the Key West proposition is the key to the protection of the Florida Straits and to the Panama Canal, and that is why the committee heretofore, having the backing of all the naval strategists, Secretary of Navy Meyer, Secretary Daniels, after full investigation—also the Helm Board report and the McCain Board—and all of them come under what I spoke of as naval strategists—therefore the Committee on Naval Affairs reported the project that is carried in this bill.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and reserve the remainder of my time, reserving, of course, the right to control the floor. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the House conferees on the agreement they have reached. I congratulate the House on this report as now presented. The Senate increased the naval bill as it passed the House by approximately $100,000,000. In the other branch during the consideration of the naval bill there was a good deal of discussion on the matter of reduction, but after the smoke had cleared away no considerable reduction in the amount reported by the Senate had been made. It is true there was an item of $1,800,000 that was clearly not necessary after the agreement that no bounty shall be paid, and the Senate bill was reduced by that amount. Except for that no reductions were made in the Senate from the amount reported by the Senate committee. It remained for the House conferees in the face of that situation to prove to the Senate conferees that the increase of $98,000,000 was unnecessary for the maintenance of a navy, for the maintenance of a good navy, for the maintenance of a good navy in a thoroughly efficient manner. Some of the newspapers of the country have seen fit since the conference agreement was published to bewail the fact that the Navy was upon the rocks, that the small-navy men in the House had had their way, and the Navy was to all intents and purposes a wreck. The fact is that the naval bill as it passed the House was a liberal bill; it was a bill drawn by gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber who are favorable to a strong and efficient Navy. It made abundant provision for such a navy; it made liberal provision for such a navy.

And that it did make abundant and liberal provision for the Navy is proven by the fact that, in the face of earnest insistence on the part of the Senate conferees and of the Naval Establishment, the House conferees were able to persuade the Senate committee that they could not stand justified before the country in insistence upon the increases they had made. Of course, it was not to be expected, with such a wide difference of opinion existing, that the House could have its way altogether. There must be something of compromise, but the compromise, from the House standpoint, was very small indeed. The committee have agreed to add 7,000 men to the Navy and Marine Corps above the number that the House believed—that the House committee believed and still believe—was reasonably sufficient for the Navy. We have, it is true, forces of considerable number, such as the air and wireless forces, in the Naval Establishment not formerly a part of the Navy personnel.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Taking those forces into consideration, there was a very considerable argument on behalf of some increase in the personnel of the Navy in order to provide not only for the old-time personnel but for some 6,000 of those in these newer classes of naval personnel, adding 1,000 to the Marine Corps in order to maintain the percentage as between the Marine Corps and the Navy that we have long maintained.

Six million five hundred thousand dollars the conferees agree to accept out of $98,000,000. It is not so much a triumph on the part of the House—I would not so state it or consider it—but it is a triumph for careful, conservative examination of the needs of the service, that after the examination of the subject the House committee gave its conferees were able to maintain its position. They were able to do so because they had gone thoroughly into the matter and understood it in all its details.

The conference will, in addition to the $6,500,000 agreed to in the conference report, which I hope will be adopted, ask the House, as I understand it, to acquiesce in a motion agreeing to an additional appropriation of something over six million for new aircraft. It will be recalled that when the bill was before the House in the last Congress the Naval Committee of the House, having jurisdiction of the matter of new aircraft, advised an appropriation for it in a sum considerably in excess of the amount now proposed. That item could only be accepted by unanimous consent, and I took the responsibility, no one else assuming it, to object to that addition to the bill, suggesting that the question of new aircraft could be taken up in conference and there decided upon. We must make provision for new aircraft. We knew that at the time the bill passed the House, and I called attention to the fact. The amendment should be adopted.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. How many different lines of aircraft activities do we have, and what is the total amount of appropriation for all?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will propound that to some one who has gone carefully into it and is prepared to answer it, we will all of us be under obligations to him and to whomever answers. I do not now recall in detail, and if I did, I could not answer in the time allotted me. I understand we have expended something over $100,000,000 for aircraft activities of all sorts and kinds within the past year.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question, for my own enlightenment and the enlightenment possibly of some other Members of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. COCKRAN. In describing the character of the Navy that has been established by this measure, I should like to know how the Navy compares with the other navies of the world, if the gentleman is prepared to tell us. Does it give us the first navy or the second navy or the third navy?

Mr. MONDELL. I have discovered that the question of the relative size or strength is to a considerable extent a matter of opinion. I do not know that we shall be able to say that we have the largest Navy in the world, but we shall have a good Navy and one adequate to our needs.

Mr. COCKRAN. Would the gentleman enlighten the House what form of construction can be used except by its comparison to other navies?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman's question involves an analysis which, of course, I have not time to make in the remaining fragment of a five-minute speech.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. COCKRAN. And nobody can employ it better.

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will yield, speaking of first and second class navies, England had a first-class navy and Germany a second-class navy, but the second class was not worth a tuppence in the late war.

Mr. COCKRAN. It is just like a second-best hand at poker. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. There are quite a number of items still in disagreement. With regard to some of them I do not know the attitude of the House committee of conference. They have done so exceedingly well so far as they have gone that I should be rather inclined to follow their judgment, and yet I trust that they will not ask us to agree to any of the increased or any of the new appropriations which were not agreed to in conference. And I hope they will not ask us to agree to any of the new legislation which the Senate placed on the bill. I know there are one or two of those items of legislation that appeal strongly to some gentlemen. Some gentlemen think we ought perhaps to provide for an aircraft carrier.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I have only five minutes. Some gentlemen may think that we ought to provide for a bureau of aeronautics in the Navy Department. Some gentlemen may think that we ought to have an additional flying station up in the Pacific Northwest. It seems, gentlemen, that there is only one logical thing for the House to do, and that is to refuse to consider favorably any of these new propositions that come to us in this irregular way. [Applause.]

I think that the legislative committees are entitled to have their jurisdiction protected, and I hope that no one of the legislative committees, after having somewhat protested that their jurisdiction had been shortened by taking from them authority to appropriate, will now ask the House to agree to items of legislation that the House has not passed upon favorably, or items that the committee has not passed upon favorably.

Whether the committee has been favorable to those items or not, they ought to be considered by the House in an orderly way, and I assure gentlemen here and now that the committees having jurisdiction over these matters will have an early opportunity to have their propositions considered by the House.

But let us preserve the orderly procedure of this body. Let us preserve the jurisdiction of our legislative committees, and let us insist that we shall not pass important legislation on an appropriation bill; that we shall not appropriate in a large way for entirely new enterprises which the House has not agreed to or approved.

If we follow the rule that we shall treat all these items alike, without regard to our view as to their merits, in order that they may be considered on their merits in due course, we shall save money for the taxpayers of the country, and in the long run we shall have better legislation. I hope that we will adhere to that policy. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the adoption of the conference report. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 1: Page 2, line 14, after the word "employees," insert "and for mileage, at 5 cents per mile, to midshipmen entering the Naval Academy while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as midshipmen."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment, which was stricken from the bill on my motion during the present Congress, not because of my antipathy to the bill, but because of my objection to the silly rules under which the House is now operating.

I am rather amazed at the statement of the distinguished leader, Mr. MONDELL, a moment ago, suggesting to the House that the jurisdiction of the legislative committees be not infringed. He suggests that there is not a single amendment, although many of them are recommended by the distinguished Committee on Appropriations, to which the House should now recede and concur. Our leader says we should pay no attention to them, but wipe them all out, for fear of violating the jurisdiction of the legislative committee, of which I happen to be a member, namely, the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Committee on Naval Affairs unanimously reported in the last Congress many of the legislative features that have been incorporated in this bill by the Senate at its request. Is the gentleman going to suggest that we should go out of business just because of the silly rules under which we are operating has taken away our very life? Until these rules are changed we are going to have statements made like the one by the distinguished chairman of our committee, that $50,000,000 might be saved in a certain direction.

What transpires under existing conditions? The Navy Department makes a suggestion to Congress, to the Speaker of the House. That suggestion comes to our committee or to the Committee on Appropriations, and the buck is passed. An admiral will come before us and he will say, "The Navy desires certain legislation; it desires certain appropriations." We suggest that they go to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations sends them back to us.

Until we change the rules, gentlemen, we are not going to have proper legislation here. There is no question about that. Until we change the rules the Senate, not the House, is going to be the legislative body of Congress. How else can we get legislation? We tried in the last Congress. We had a bill reported unanimously. Several Members appeared before the Committee on Rules and requested a preferential status. That committee, as it determined the other day on a very important bill, decided that our matter was not of sufficient importance to justify a rule, and in consequence we got no preferential status, but had to wait our turn. That is because our Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Military Affairs, and various other former appropriating committees are now simply dead committees, and they will continue to be dead committees until the system is changed.

I am addressing my remarks now to the new Members of Congress. This rule throttling the proper jurisdiction of committees was not given serious consideration before it was adopted except by a comparatively few men, who arranged to control the destinies of the House. The adoption of that rule was taken up as an incident to the budget system, and it was right prior to the election, when few would object to a supposed budget rule, and nobody wanted to obstruct budget legislation, and this silly rule under which we are now operating was then put through. Now, three or four men control absolutely everything that comes before the House. That was illustrated yesterday in the case of the Volstead bill. The Committee on Rules says, "You must not bring in this bill," or "You must not bring in that bill. We will substitute one of our own." The Committee on Rules dominated the situation entirely, and said that the House would get its amended Volstead bill or none.

Our great leader from Wyoming talks about the present condition of the Navy and its preparedness.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; not now. I will not mention any names, but there is a lot of legislation in this bill that is being opposed by small-Navy men, men who before you and I came here were small-Navy men. They have always preached a small Navy in the apparent interest of economy, and they are small-Navy men to-day. Certainly they do not want a bureau of aeronautics. It might increase the expenditures of the Navy Department $10,000 or $12,000 a year, and save $20,000,000 a year, because of the obnoxious methods which are now being used in the control of aviation in the Navy through various departments. There are other features in this bill that have been thoroughly investigated by the Committee on Naval Affairs and reported out unanimously by that committee. The Committee on Naval Affairs desire that legislation in the interest of the Navy. Lots of it does not cost the Treasury a penny. The Navy wants it. Experts in naval affairs want it. Not our distinguished leader. He is not an expert in naval affairs any more than you and I are as we sit here on this floor. Naval officers desire this legislation. They want it now, and the only way they can get it is by the House agreeing to recede and concur in certain Senate amendments, and that motion will be made in many instances by the gentleman who is controlling the bill for the Committee on Appropriations on the floor of the House [Mr. KELLEY of Michigan]. Why should we not put it in? What is the objection? It is not going to cost anything—this legislation that the Navy desires and ought to have—because the experts interested in the Navy want it. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment numbered 1.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] is decidedly inconsistent. This item would have been in the bill except for him. It has been carried in appropriation bills for some time, and everybody has been for it.

Mr. BUTLER. How long does the gentleman say it has been carried in the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. For some years.

Mr. BUTLER. Mighty few. I helped to put it in within two or three years.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman tell us how long it has been in the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. For some years.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is a great reply!

Mr. MONDELL. Nobody disapproves of it. Everybody was for it; but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] struck this item from the bill, although he approved of it.

Here is an item that everybody is for, a regular item in an appropriation bill. It was in the bill when it was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which the gentleman is a member, and was supported by him. Then because he could strike it out by making a point of order on the bill as reported by the Appropriations Committee, it went out. If I were the gentleman from Illinois, I would stand pat. I would stand by my position. I shall not vote to recede and concur. I shall still vote to sustain the jurisdiction of his committee. The gentleman complains that his committee has not anything to do. If any committee in the House has nothing to do, it is because that committee does not do the things that lie right before it. If there is a saving of $50,000,000 that can be made in naval expenditures, for Heaven's sake let the Committee on Naval Affairs, that knows about the Navy, show us how we can make that saving and it will be done. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Why does not the gentleman suggest an amendment to the rules, so that the Committee on Naval Affairs will have a privileged status in the House when it comes in with legislation?

Mr. MONDELL. I shall be perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. BRITTEN. Well, do it, and do not talk so much about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Illinois will kindly keep within the rules. The gentleman from Wyoming does not make the rules of the House. Long ago I said, and I have said it repeatedly, that I should be glad to see the House amend the rules in the way he has suggested. No one on the Naval Affairs Committee has proposed it. There has been nothing of that kind proposed to the Committee on Rules as far as I know. Further than that, these legislative committees will have their day in court. They will have their day before the House. Whenever they bring their propositions before the House, as soon as they can be reached they will be, so far as I have any influence in giving them that opportunity.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman very much. Now, we can get right down to what this means. I am not going to stand for a lot of the legislation proposed in this bill. If the House sees fit to legislate on this bill, and will indicate to me where the furniture of the Naval Affairs Committee room can be disposed of, I will send it there this afternoon.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I am with the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. You talk about making fish of one and flesh of another. Here is just a little bit of an item that my friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] took out of the bill. He had a right to take it out, and he did it. I am not criticizing him for that, but it is mighty good for these young lads who have not anything to do, that they should have——

Mr. MONDELL. I have said repeatedly the provision ought never to have gone out of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. We have reported it favorably.

Mr. MONDELL. It would have been in the bill except for the action of the gentleman from Illinois, and the House will undoubtedly follow the committee; but so far as I am concerned, I want to preserve my duty of impartiality and fairness to these legislative committees, and I shall do it. I do not ask anybody to follow me. This item ought to go in the bill. It ought to have been left in the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. But it is out.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it will get back. The gentleman will vote for it, and most everybody will vote for it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman a question. What hope have we of getting an hour or two hours or two days in which we can act upon legislation reported from this committee?

Mr. MONDELL. I will go before the Committee on Rules with the gentleman at any time.

Mr. BUTLER. Go before the Committee on Rules and ask for a day for two or three provisions in this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I have very recently urged a rule for legislation from the Committee on Military Affairs. They have their rule, and if the gentleman will make the same request for his committee I have no doubt that he will be given an opportunity to bring up his legislation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; anticipating the gentleman's question, we hope this will expedite the passage of the tariff bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he does not think that while the House is waiting for a committee that has privilege to report, which seems to be delaying unduly, that these gentlemen who have not the privilege may be properly given it? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I am sure that the gentleman from Tennessee, a member of the Committee on Rules, will be very glad to afford the opportunity for the committees whenever they desire to be heard.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, the gentleman will understand that when he pledges me in that way he is authorized to a certain extent, but it must be emphasized that I shall not be compelled to do anything that will interfere with the tariff bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to be recognized, but I ask the gentleman from Michigan if he will not take two minutes in order that I may ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Very well.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if he will not make to the House a statement of his intentions with reference to these legislative provisions? Assertions have been made that the gentleman would move to concur in some of the legislative provisions. That is not my understanding.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to briefly answer some statements made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], which, I think, if unanswered may mislead the House. The House conferees have not nor will they ask the House to concur in any legislation placed on this bill by the Senate, but the House conferees have consistently insisted that matters of legislation should not be placed on an appropriation bill, and we have brought these matters back for the consideration of the House at the urgent insistance of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], a member of the House Naval Committee. The gentleman from Illinois came before the House conferees and also before a joint session of the Senate and House conferees and urgently insisted that these matters be brought back to the House. He stated to the conferees of both House and Senate that the House Naval Committee was anxious that this legislation be brought back in order that members of his committee might move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not that rather an unusual procedure, for a Member of the House to appear before a conference committee and thus urge them? I never assumed to do that in all the years that I have been here.

Mr. OLIVER. It may be unusual, but I am stating what occurred, and the House will determine whether it is unusual or not. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I hold in my hand a typewritten sheet prepared for the gentleman controlling the bill in which various amendments are noted, "Recede and concur with an amendment," "Recede and concur," "Recede and concur with an amendment," one of them being the naval hospital at San Diego. The gentleman will observe that that is new legislation on the bill. That is the reason I made that statement. If I am in error, I am willing to be corrected.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think the gentleman from Alabama states the thing exactly as it is. It was my understanding that the gentleman from Illinois wanted to move to recede and concur in some of these amendments, whereupon I kindly consented to prepare the amendments for him. [Laughter].

Mr. OLIVER. I can not yield further. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] correctly states the position of the committee in reference to the preparation of the amendments. The Appropriations Committee has tried to show the legislative committee every courtesy and proper deference. When they appeared before us, as we thought, through the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], and requested that we permit the House to at least hear the legislative committee on these matters, and that they would urge the House to pass the same, out of deference to such request from the legislative committee we brought this legislation back, but with the distinct understanding that the House conferees would not ask the House to recede and concur in the amendments. These are the facts, and I hope will make clear to the Members of the House that the conferees of the House have not sought to trespass on the rights of the legislative committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Michigan give the gentleman from Alabama two minutes more, as I want to have a little talk with my old friend? We have been for several years on the same committee. I know exactly how jealous the gentleman is for the rights of the legislative committee.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama two minutes more.

Mr. BUTLER. I saw the paper to which my friend from Illinois refers. I did not know what it was, but my friend used the second person, looking at me. Did the gentleman understand that I was going to move to concur and strip the underclothing, all that is left, from the committee over which I preside? I am against this legislation. Did the gentleman mean to convey to the House that it was expected that I would move to concur?

Mr. OLIVER. No; I did not mean to convey that impression. I understood from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] that he had been selected as the spokesman of the legislative committee, and——

Mr. BUTLER. My friend from Illinois understands my position, that I am jealous of the little bit of jurisdiction that is left to my committee, and I do not want to send for the woodbox and the trunk just yet.

Mr. OLIVER. It gives me pleasure to state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] at no time mentioned the matter of any legislation carried on the appropriation bill to the conferees of either the House or the Senate, but the information that the House legislative committee favored the amendments was communicated to the conferees by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], and my recollection is that Mr. BRITTEN at that time stated that he felt the House legislative committee unanimously favored the legislation.

Mr. BRITTEN. On the ground that it had been unanimously reported by the Naval Committee.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Now, as to this amendment which provides for the expenses of the midshipmen, that has been carried in the regular appropriation bill a long time.

Mr. BUTLER. Two years.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. In the regular appropriation bill, and it went out on a point of order. Of course, if it is not put in this bill, the Committee on Naval Affairs can authorize this expenditure and it can be handled as a deficiency later. The expense for this year is taken care of out of the current appropriation, and the Naval Committee can legislate upon the subject before the students are required to come in next year. The Committee on Appropriations does not care which course is pursued. The simplest way is to put it in this bill at this time, but it can be done the other way. If the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] be agreed to, it will come in here, and if not it will have to be included in a deficiency after the naval committee has reported a bill authorizing the expenditure.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS. Does the gentleman mean that these expenses are provided for in other legislation for the fiscal year 1922?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No.

Mr. ANDREWS. Or 1921?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No; but the boys enter the academy for the coming school year prior to the 1st of July, so that the expenses of entering this year for next year are already provided for.

Mr. ANDREWS. But the expenses incurred from July 1, 1921, forward will not be provided for unless this provision carries.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is correct; but, of course, the 1922 boys are already in and the 1923 boys will not enter the academy until late in June, 1922. There will be plenty of time to provide for them.

Mr. ANDREWS. But some of them enter now or on the 1st of July.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And in the meantime the legislative committee can provide for those expenses.

Mr. ANDREWS. Some are entering the 1st of July next, but they are not provided for in this bill. They would be if the motion is agreed to.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is true. It will have to be taken care of in a deficiency bill; but there would be ample time to provide legislative authority. The simplest way is to put it back into the bill at this time—all those old provisions that were taken out on points of order, and there are only a few of them. This is about the only one, I think, that makes any difference.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman says that the legislative committee could do this. The gentleman regards this, then, as an authorization and not as an appropriation?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It has been carried as an annual item in the regular Navy appropriation bill for a number of years, but it was not permanent law, and because it was not it was subject to the point of order, and went out at the instigation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Then the best thing to do would be for the Naval Committee to make a permanent authorization, and then it would be regularly carried in the appropriation bill.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. And that we have already reported, and I think the bill is on the calendar.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Even if there were such an authorization now, there would still have to be an item of appropriation.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It would have to be carried in a deficiency bill some time during the year, so I say I have no objection one way or the other. If the House shall vote in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] it will be put into this bill, otherwise the item will have to come along at some other time.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman think we ought to vote for this or against it?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I do not care anything about it either way. Of course, the Committee on Appropriations included the item in the bill when it was first reported because it was a customary item carried in the regular appropriation bill and it is in no sense new legislation. We thought that we were within the spirit of the rule which provided that legislation should go to the Naval Affairs Committee, and appropriations to the Appropriations Committee, when we did not bring in any propositions not carried in former bills.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think I understand the status. The status is that when the bill was before the House these amendments went out on points of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] because they were legislative matters. The gentleman from Illinois now wants them back because they went out on his points of order, and so makes this motion. The gentleman from Michigan in charge of the bill thought they ought to be in the bill when he brought it in originally. However, having gone out on points of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Michigan now brings them back and refuses to make a motion to put them in. The majority leader thinks they ought to be in, but the majority leader refuses to vote for them because he is jealous of the authority of the legislative committee. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs thinks we ought to defeat them, so as to protect the jurisdiction of his committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, I do not care anything about it. The House can do as it pleases.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] thinks we ought to adopt his motion. The matter is so confusing that I wanted to get the views of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana has outlined the status of affairs, and under it he has the finest opportunity in the world to exercise his most excellent judgment.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I think the situation is very well understood, and I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 7: Page 4, line 2, after the word "Navy" insert "and for such purposes as he may deem proper, $50,000."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, this Senate amendment had been carried in the annual naval appropriation bill and was stricken out on a point of order made by myself. I now move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It is in the same category as the other.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 8: Page 4, line 20, after the figures "$343,440" insert: "Provided, That no person owing allegiance to any country other than the United States of America shall be eligible to hold office as a member of the colonial councils of the Virgin Islands of the United States nor to hold any public office under the government of said islands; Provided further, That the income tax laws now in force in the United States of America and those which may hereafter be enacted shall be held to be likewise in force in the Virgin Islands of the United States, except that the proceeds of such taxes shall be paid into the treasuries of said islands."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist on the House disagreement to Senate amendment No. 8.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I make the preferential motion to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to recede and concur.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, this amendment, it seems, can be divided, and I think, even though part of it should be concurred in, that possibly the House would not want to concur in all; and I would suggest that we have it understood that the vote may be taken——

Mr. TOWNER. You can divide the question if you see fit after I make a statement, but I do not think then you will want to divide it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Can the Committee on Naval Affairs put such a provision as this on a naval appropriation bill?

Mr. TOWNER. Well, I think the gentleman from New Jersey will recognize the fact that the Virgin Islands are now under the control of the Navy Department, and the appropriation that the gentleman will see immediately preceding this amendment is made for the support of the Virgin Islands in this bill, and therefore we presume the Senate amendment was introduced for that reason. Now, gentlemen, let me call your attention to this provision. It consists, as the gentleman from Idaho well said, of two parts. The first part is this:

That no person owing allegiance to any country other than the United States of America shall be eligible to hold office as a member of the colonial councils of the Virgin Islands of the United States nor to hold any public office under the government of said islands.

The reason of that amendment is found in these facts. The government of the Virgin Islands is, after all, now very largely the government as it was under Danish control. The legislative authority consists of two councils, one of the combined islands of St. Thomas and St. Johns and the other the island of St. Croix, each having its separate colonial council. When the act was passed and the treaty was made by which the jurisdiction of the islands was taken from the Danish Government and put under the United States it was left to the inhabitants of the Virgin Islands to keep their citizenship of the Virgin Islands and remain subject to the sovereignty of Denmark if they so desired. Quite a number—not a great number, but quite a number—did this. However, under the laws then existing, which were continued temporarily and are now in existence awaiting the Americanization of the laws, which is, however, taking place very rapidly—under those laws men who were simply citizens of the Danish Islands were eligible to serve in the colonial councils governing the islands, so that we have this anomalous condition over there: That Danes, subject to the sovereignty of Denmark, are serving in an American possession and legislating for American citizens in those islands. Of course, that is an anomaly that no longer ought to exist, and I hope gentlemen will all recognize the necessity for the passage of this amendment, because it may be some time before we can secure a recodification of the laws so they will be Americanized. That is the first provision.

The second one is this:

That the income tax laws now in force in the United States of America and those which may hereafter be enacted shall be held to be likewise in force in the Virgin Islands of the United States, except that the proceeds of such taxes shall be paid into the Treasury of said islands.

Gentlemen will notice that this also consists of two propositions. In the first place, shall we extend the revenue laws of the United States to the Virgin Islands? We have this anomalous condition over there at this time, that the Treasury Department has found that the revenue laws do not hold in the Virgin Islands, and therefore we can not collect any taxes that are imposed under the authority of the United States in the Virgin Islands. It seems to me quite clear that gentlemen will recognize the necessity that that should be done. Now, we have this further condition in this, we are required very largely to furnish money to run the government of the Virgin Islands. We hope that condition will not very long exist, but it does exist to-day, as you will see by the appropriation, $343,440, in the preceding paragraph for the support of the government of the Virgin Islands. Now, it makes no difference whether we put the money in the treasury over there and then take it out as it will be required to do, or whether the money that is collected over there should remain subject to the control of the islands for the purpose of maintaining and carrying on their government. Of course, there is nothing gained in sending it to the United States Treasury and then sending it back, and it will decrease in the exact proportion of the amount that we will be required to appropriate when it can be put in the treasury of the Virgin Islands. Besides, this is true: We have always, we did, and do now in the Philippines, allowed them to use the revenues they collect for the support of their government. We have also in Porto Rico, and we will doubtless do the same when we make permanent laws for the Virgin Islands and establish a civil government over there, so it occurs to me there can be no objection to either of these propositions.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the receipts for the income tax laws, after they are applied to the inhabitants of the Virgin Islands, are covered into the treasury of the islands so that there will be money available in both treasuries for governmental expenses, should we still make an appropriation as contained in the original text of the present appropriation bill?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, yes; I am quite sure that is true.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Then we are appropriating for the expenses of the Government, collecting revenues which go into the treasuries of the islands, and no provision is made for taking the money out of the treasuries of the islands and applying it to the expenses of the government?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, no; it will decrease the necessity for our appropriating here just to that extent, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But we will get no benefit during the next fiscal year?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly we will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman is chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Has the gentleman's committee considered this matter and reported a bill or had any hearings on a bill to this effect?

Mr. TOWNER. No; except in this regard: We did consider the entire question of revenues of the islands, and we have considered the entire question of the necessity of extending the laws to the islands and have made a report accordingly, although not permanently upon the appropriation or upon this provision. That was made some months ago.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Do you not think it would be advisable for your committee to report out some legislation of this kind and have it passed as a separate enactment?

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that this is the difficulty with regard to that: We are now trying to recodify and Americanize the laws of the islands. It is thought best by the committee that visited the islands and went into the investigation very carefully that that should be done by the people of the islands themselves. That being so, some of their local laws have already been passed, and they are now recodifying the entire system, so that that will be taken care of. We can not make a civil government for those islands at the present time, because of the conditions that exist, and which perhaps it would be best I should not discuss with the gentleman. It will probably be some time before we can pass a law that will give them a civil government. We hope to do so as soon as possible.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would like to ask whether the condition of the Virgin Islands is such that it is safe to make these two changes, one of which is to debar Danes of high character who are there holding office, and the second is to introduce the United States system of taxation in islands of that character—a system of taxation which is so different from their own? It seems to me this is rather a big thing to be done on an appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNER. I have no hesitancy in answering both of the gentleman's questions in the affirmative. Certainly we do not want foreigners to be legislating for American citizens. That is the answer to that proposition. The other answer is that all the revenues collected down there of an internal nature are collected for the benefit of the people of the islands.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am speaking of the system. The system of income tax is an unusual system, and I did not suppose it existed there. It means the establishment of a revenue collector and going through all the questionnaires with them, and it will be an exceedingly unpopular thing to introduce that form of taxation. I should like to do it after debate on a separate bill instead of doing it on an appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman can make his own reservations about that matter, but I am quite sure he would acquiesce in the wisdom of it if he knew the entire circumstances.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. STAFFORD in the chair). The question before the House is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to recede and concur.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the Chair was in doubt.

Thereupon the House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 15.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 11: Page 5, line 15, after the figures "$1,440,000," insert "for new construction and procurement of aircraft and equipment, $6,125,750."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist on disagreement to Senate amendment No. 11.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan moves to further insist on the disagreement to Senate amendment No. 11.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion to recede and concur with an amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HICKS moves to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 11, with the following amendment: In lieu of the sum proposed in said amendment insert "$5,323,000."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I have offered I think carries out the purpose probably of the gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee themselves, but of course they were prohibited from suggesting this appropriation because of the rule. This sum appropriates practically the same amount of money for new aircraft which the Naval Affairs Committee have already passed upon and approved of. As a matter of fact, the amount stated in this amendment is $753,000 less than the Naval Affairs Committee thought proper for new aircraft. It provides for lighter-than-air craft, and heavier-than-air craft and equipment. As the Members of Congress know, all kinds of aircraft are subject to rapid deterioration; there must be replacements frequently, and this appropriation simply provides for what the Naval Affairs Committee themselves find proper for the new aircraft for the following year. And for that reason, Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the items that neither our good friend Dawes nor our committee on reorganization have had time to get to yet in stopping some of the duplications in expenses so long existing in our Government. It may be true that we have not much left of appropriations for new construction in aircraft in the Navy, but there is plenty of money available for new construction and experimentation purposes with respect to aircraft in the Army, as we gave $19,000,000 to it the other day, and we have given the Post Office Department recently over $2,000,000 for aircraft purposes, and here we are continuing to duplicate this expense in the Navy, when all ought to be combined under one head and under one supervision. And when the chairman of the committee and the conferees on behalf of the Members of the House, who believe in economy, have refused to accede to this demand of the Senate that this extra sum of $6,000,000 be spent, and have brought the bill back here for further disagreement, then we have the motion passing without anyone objecting to it on the Republican side of the aisle. I think the time has come when our good friends over on this other side of the aisle ought to stop this duplication. Give our reorganization committee and our man Dawes a chance to stop this expense. Mr. Dawes has just reached Washington. He has not had time to begin his labors. Let us give him a chance. This is one of the items of duplication that he should consider, and I think we ought to vote against this $5,000,000 increase. I think we ought to begin right here in stopping duplication of expense.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Of course.

Mr. HICKS. The gentleman, I think, wants to be fair.

Mr. BLANTON. I do.

Mr. HICKS. When the Appropriations Committee reported this bill a few months ago they would undoubtedly have included this item in the Committee of the Whole had it not been for the rule which prohibits them from appropriating for new aircraft and new types of vessels. It was not because they did not realize the aid of it. It was because of the rule that prevented them from doing it.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, does not the gentleman want to give Mr. Dawes a chance to have "a little look in" on this proposition? Does he not want to give Mr. Dawes an opportunity to decide whether or not there ought to be some concentration under one head of these three different branches of aircraft construction?

Mr. HICKS. I would be only too delighted to have Mr. Dawes look into it, and I hope he will. But in the meantime I am not willing to have the Army and the Navy exposed for lack of sufficient material while we are waiting for reports. This simply carries out one of the needs of the department.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that this is not a budgetary question, but a military problem, and Mr. Dawes has nothing to do with it, and never will have.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope he will have something to do with it and that he will keep down some of the duplicated expenses in respect to military and naval affairs; because the distinguished gentleman from Chicago [Mr. BRITTEN] knows that over 90 per cent of the expense that comes out of the Public Treasury is expense incident to wars—military and naval affairs—and if our reorganization committee and Mr. Dawes are going to reach the big expenses of this Nation they have got to look after what is spent on the Army and the Navy. You have got to begin there, and I think it is time we should begin looking after these proposed $5,000,000 increases. I am going to give every man in this House a chance to vote on this retrenchment proposition, and let you show your constituents by your vote whether or not you are for economy and whether or not you are for retrenchment, and whether or not you are for stopping this duplication, because you have not got a quorum. Unless you demand a quorum first and head me off, I am going to force a record vote and give you an opportunity to vote yes or no on this proposition of a $5,000,000 increase.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Is not a large part of the 90 per cent you are talking about a fixed charge on the Federal Government occasioned by reason of the war?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. A big bunch of it comes from duplication, I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Delaware, who is usually in favor of economy.

Mr. LAYTON. I am, but I am in favor of the truth.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not that the truth?

Mr. LAYTON. I want the gentleman to answer me that question—whether 90 per cent of our Government expenditures are not a fixed charge on the Federal Treasury occasioned by reason of the war?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; Army, Navy, pensions, care of disabled service men, and so forth; but if you will look into the matter you will find there is large duplication of expense which, if stopped, would cause less taxes to be taken from the people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from New York [Mr. HICKS] moves to recede and concur in the amendment. I want to ask my colleague if we had any hearings on this this year?

Mr. HICKS. I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania that we have had very exhaustive hearings, and this estimate is based on those hearings of last winter.

Mr. BUTLER. I know we had last year.

Mr. HICKS. Yes; and we thought that there should be about $750,000 more appropriated for this than my amendment calls for.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not going to oppose this, but I want the House to understand that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is not idle when he makes the statement that he means to put you on record. You voted here the other day for $1,100,000 for clerks, and I put you on record then. You can not escape it. Yet, if we intend to maintain a naval service we shall have to make this appropriation. We have reported in favor of it. It is a part of the service and is very important—the aviation branch.

My colleague [Mr. HICKS] has suggested the very lowest amount that should be appropriated for it, $5,000,000 and something. And along comes another item following this that will increase the amount for aviation. I understood the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to say—and I hope the gentleman from Wyoming will give me his attention for a moment—that he anticipated that this would be one of the items that the House might accept. Yes; I do not see how we can avoid it. But there are other items coming here, and I ask you all to be in your seats, because if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] does not maintain a quorum I propose to do it, and point out to you how you can save to this Government money.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. I simply wanted to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs whether he favors this increased appropriation?

Mr. BUTLER. I wish I did not have to say I do. I think it is necessary. I hate to appropriate the $5,000,000 more.

Mr. LAYTON. How is it that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS], who is a very active member of the committee, seem to differ as to the question of how many hearings they have had on this subject?

Mr. BUTLER. I want to answer that question. My colleague and old friend from New York [Mr. HICKS] knows more about this subject than any 25 men in this House. I have followed him in his examination of the subject. I know that he is economical, and therefore I know that when he reaches the conclusion, as he has done here, that it has become an absolute necessity to make the appropriation I am willing to vote for it. [Applause.] I wish that I did not have it to do. But, gentlemen, you will have other opportunities on warships and on naval stations before you get through, and I intend to put my best efforts against them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important amendment, and one that I think should be agreed to. I want to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS], who proposed a reduction of $750,000 from the House Naval Affairs Committee estimates, why he is maintaining that reduction? Our committee has investigated the matter, and what we had reported was, as I thought, a rather scant appropriation for the Air Service, considering its very great importance. Why are you making a motion to concur, reducing the amount by $750,000, and from what activity is it to be deducted?

Mr. HICKS. I will say to my friend from Tennessee, who is a friend of aviation, that he knows that we based our bill largely on the hearings of last winter, and that since we had those hearings and made up our estimates there has been quite a large reduction in the cost of the material and labor that goes into these planes and dirigibles. And also, as the gentleman knows, we hoped that there would be certain increased activities in this direction that have not taken place. Therefore we do not need so many machines as we did. The amount was reduced because of the decreased cost of labor and material, and because it was thought that we could probably reduce the number of machines in order to meet the requirements of what is going to be a smaller Navy than we contemplated last year.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman states that the reduction is based on the lessened cost of labor and material and also upon a reduction in the activities of the Navy and the Air Service.

Mr. HICKS. If this bill becomes a law, there will be a smaller Navy than was contemplated last winter.

Mr. PADGETT. Considering the importance of this branch of the service, I hope the House will agree to this appropriation, because while I do not think the Air Service is going to destroy the other activities of the Navy, and while we are still going to need battleships, battle cruisers, submarines, and destroyers, and the other activities of the Navy, yet this is an activity that is very important. It is in its infancy, and we should be liberal with it in its development. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HICKS. Let me take this opportunity to thank my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] for the entirely too complimentary remarks which he has made in reference to me. While I appreciate his generous words, my work has been so insignificant as to warrant no praise. I want to say that this amendment embodies the crux of the aviation situation for the Navy. If you believe in aviation, this amendment must be adopted. If it is defeated, we will have little except make-believe activities in the Aviation Service for one year more. We will be compelled to use old planes and obsolete equipment, which is neither just to the men who operate them or fair to the Navy. Efficiency in aviation demands that this amendment become a law in order that we may hold our place and provide the facilities which experts and laymen alike agree are vital to our development. Why hesitate and jeopardize the future? Why lack the faith in aviation in the face of what it has already accomplished? I do not intend to prophesy, but I am firmly of the opinion that this arm of our service will produce results far in excess of what we see to-day. Its future holds potentialities beyond our present conception of them, and it maybe will create a different standard of measurement for the construction of our fleet in the years to come. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HICKS. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] is in control of the time, but I will gladly reply to my friend if I am given the opportunity.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman believe it is absolutely imperative that we should at this time vote for this increased expenditure, when we are all looking forward to an agreement among the nations for a reduction in armament and a saving of expenses in this direction. Does the gentleman believe, in view of that fact, that it is necessary to make this expenditure?

Mr. HICKS. Yes; in the same way that we are making an expenditure in carrying on the construction of battleships. No one is more heartily in favor of an international agreement for the curtailment of armament than I am or is the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. True.

Mr. HICKS. It seems to me there should be an international agreement on that subject, and when that comes we can then lop off here and there, but do not let us be too hasty. Let us see if the other nations will join with us.

Mr. BUTLER. I deplore the necessity for the expenditure.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman realize that there is a movement now on foot to coordinate and concentrate the Air Service all under one head and stop duplication, and does not the gentleman think that it is a good idea, before expending this $5,000,000 in one department, to wait until we ascertain whether it is feasible to concentrate all the Air Service under one head?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, in the course of this debate it has been stated that we can not tell how much we are appropriating annually for the Air Service. When we voted for the present Committee on Appropriations, as a part of the program for a budget, it was understood that that committee would place before the House a statement in debit and credit form so that we might know what we pay for ships, what we appropriate for aircraft, what we appropriate for each distinct branch of the public service.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. No; not now. Mr. Speaker, if we are unable to tell how much we are appropriating for aircraft, I think here is a good place to stop until we find out. [Applause.] And if the floor leader of this House is unable to find out from all the sources of information at his command, he would better begin to go to school on that question and find out.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. Yes; I will.

Mr. MONDELL. The floor leader does not pretend to have at his tongue's end the details of all items of legislation. Aircraft appropriations are made in many forms in a number of services. The total is something over $100,000,000. If the gentleman from Nebraska is anxious to know just what the amount is, he has all the sources of information that any one of us has.

Mr. ANDREWS. Ah, but the floor leader is the mouthpiece of the House, particularly of the Republican side, and why has he not gathered up the information and told us the facts?

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. Does the gentleman want to know what the Navy has been spending in aviation?

Mr. ANDREWS. No; I want to know what the total is, and I want it from reliable sources. I want to know how much we are spending for aircraft, I want to know how much we spend for distinctly military purposes, and how much we are spending for each specific branch of the public service. Not until we get to that line can the membership of this House know whether they are voting correctly or incorrectly, and here is the place to draw the line and demand a showing.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think, in view of the uncertainty of the amount that we are expending, that it is very desirable that the majority leader should attempt to expedite the consideration of the tariff bill?

Mr. ANDREWS. The gentleman is greatly interested in the tariff bill, and he is playing it for fun or for politics. I am trying to get a statement in debit and credit form that will show how we are transacting business, and that means more than the daily question as to the tariff bill propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, just a word by way of information which the gentleman is seeking. Of course, the Army bill and the Navy bill for next year have not yet become laws. The Army bill is before the President and this bill is here. The amount carried in the Army bill for aviation is $19,200,000. The amount carried in the Post Office bill for aviation is $1,250,000. If the amount which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] have agreed upon as being the proper amount for new construction and aviation in the Navy is placed on this bill it will be $13,413,431. That makes a total of $33,863,431 for aviation.

Mr. BUTLER. It is under $35,000,000 for the whole three services.

Mr. ANDREWS. Where does the $100,000,000 come from?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. This is for 1922.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. If this was of the importance that has been suggested here, why did not the committee originally recommend this amount?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that in the beginning when we took up the consideration of this item in the Committee on Appropriations we thought we had jurisdiction over it, and we conducted extensive hearings upon the subject. The new rule of the House provides that the Committee on Naval Affairs shall have jurisdiction over the authorization of ships.

It did not occur to us at the beginning that that language would include aircraft, but after a little more consideration we made up our minds that it probably would, and being anxious not to exercise any jurisdiction not intended under the rule, we told the Naval Affairs Committee that we thought they had jurisdiction over this and that we did not. When the question came up on the floor of the House, an amendment was offered making an appropriation for new aircraft on the ground that these craft were not ships. The Chair, however, ruled otherwise, as we thought perhaps might be the case, and the amendment offered at that time by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] was ruled out of order. That is why the original bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations did not include any provision for new aircraft.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman answer one other question? If this is of the importance that has been stated by the chairman of the committee and another member of the Naval Affairs Committee, why was it, after it was known by the Committee on Appropriations that this is not in order on the Naval appropriation bill, that the Committee on Naval Affairs did not take notice of the situation and make a report to this House?

Mr. HICKS. It did.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman will remember that this bill is a hang-over bill.

Mr. DOWELL. This question is presented here on a conference report.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Just a moment. This bill was passed at the last session of Congress during the last week or two of the session. There was very little time or opportunity, if time had been given, for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] to have brought in a bill for that purpose, but his committee did have hearings and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS], acting for the committee, sought to put the item on the bill on the floor. It did not get into the bill because it was subject to the point of order which was made against it.

Mr. DOWELL. But both of these gentlemen are prominent members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that committee can report a bill here if it is of this importance at any time they desire. Why should this be brought up now and sprung upon the House in the form of a conference report?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, do not spank me for what I did. The bill was reported and on the calendar at the time, but we could not get time to consider it.

Mr. DOWELL. I think it ought to go back, and that the committee should consider it, and that it should be taken up on the floor of the House, where it can be properly considered, and not on a conference report.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, no other item in this bill is in exactly the class as the item now before us. I think there are very few Members of the House on either side but would have thought when the matter was taken up by the Committee on Appropriations that that committee had authority to appropriate for new aircraft. That committee can appropriate for muskets and cannon and powder and transport service—for practically everything essential to the Navy except ships. At first blush there would seem to be no question but that the committee had the right to appropriate for new aircraft. The committee had hearings, still under the impression that it was authorized to appropriate. I think the members of that committee came to the conclusion that they ought to appropriate possibly a little more than is now carried in the item. The chairman of the subcommittee talked with me about it.

I agreed with him that in every case the doubt with regard to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations should be resolved in favor of the legislative committee, and that if there was a real doubt here they should not appropriate, but that they should serve notice as to the situation on the legislative committee and ask them to act. That was done. The Naval Affairs Committee had extensive hearings, and when the appropriation bill came before the House without the item for new airplanes the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS], as has been stated, presented the item in a somewhat larger sum than is now presented, with the indorsement of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the legislative committee having jurisdiction. I made the point of order, still trying to preserve the jurisdiction of the Naval Affairs Committee, but said at that time that eventually it would be necessary to take care of this item on this bill. A curious condition had arisen; a new point of order had been suggested which gentlemen had not thought of.

The appropriation had been carried on the appropriation bill theretofore, and it was a necessary item of expenditure. The bill now comes back from the Senate with this item in it in a smaller sum than either committee of the House considering the question believed was necessary. We have saved something like three-quarters of a million dollars from our own estimates by having the matter go to the Senate and be placed on the bill there and presented to the conferees. There is no other item in this bill which occupies the same status that this item does. I still am inclined to the opinion that the item ought to have been in order on the appropriation bill, but as it was held not to be, then, as a matter of principle, we should yield to the appropriate legislative committee, and they have given their judgment in the matter.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. If the large sum has been saved, as the gentleman suggests, by waiting a while, does not the gentleman believe that if we wait a little longer a quarter of a million more may be saved?

Mr. MONDELL. You could carry that philosophy rather too far. If we made no appropriation for the Navy at all for this year, would we save the amount carried in the bill?

Mr. LAYTON. We have saved $63,000,000 already in 10 minutes. The gentleman says the total appropriation is only $37,000,000, and the gentleman from Wyoming said it was $100,000,000.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming was not talking about appropriations. He was talking about the total expenditures for all air machines and air services for the year. It was, I believe, in excess of one hundred million. A considerable portion of it was overhang from former appropriations.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the gentleman asks for a vote, so that we may all understand as we go along, let me ask him a question. How much does it cost the Government to maintain the Naval Establishment from July 1, 1920, to July 1, 1921?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Four hundred and ninety-five million dollars.

Mr. BUTLER. How much of that is deficiency?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Sixty-one million dollars.

Mr. BUTLER. I want Members to bear that in mind.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Of that, some $30,000,000 was due to legislation.

Mr. BUTLER. For increased salaries.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to recede and concur with an amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to do that, and the first question is on the motion to recede.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 87 ayes and 24 noes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. What are we about to vote on?

The SPEAKER. On the motion to recede.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, what became of my point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. The gentleman from Michigan made a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point that he can not do that after a point of no quorum is made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan was in order. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 239, nays 72, answered "present" 1, not voting 119, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the balance of the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to recede and concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate amendment insert $5,323,000.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 14, page 6, line 2, after the figures "$275,000," insert: "New construction, buildings, and improvements at air stations at a total cost not to exceed $1,339,000, as follows: Cape May, $25,000; Coco Solo, $402,000; Hampton Roads, $78,000; Lakehurst, $360,000; Pearl Harbor, $210,000; Pensacola, $100,000; San Diego, $164,000."

Mr. MILLER. May I ask the gentleman from Michigan a short question? How many naval air bases have we?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. In a moment. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement, and in answer to the gentleman——

Mr. HICKS. I desire to offer a preferential motion.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. To answer the gentleman from Washington, I will say that we have, I think, altogether six heavier than air stations.

Mr. MILLER. How many naval aviation bases altogether, both heavier than air and lighter than air?

Mr. HICKS. Altogether 12 in the United States and Haiti.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Twelve altogether. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HICKS moves to recede and concur with the following amendment: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "New construction, buildings, improvements at air stations at a total cost not to exceed $1,177,000, as follows: Coco Solo, $392,000; Hampton Roads, $70,000; Lakehurst, $280,000; Pearl Harbor, $185,000; Pensacola, $100,000; San Diego, $150,000."

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, my amendment provides for certain improvements to be made at some of our air stations. The Committee on Naval Affairs approves of the items as I have included them in my motion, with the exception that their approval was for a larger amount than I have made in the motion. I have cut the amounts down because of the fact that there is a reduction in material and in labor costs at the present time, and therefore these improvements can probably be made at the present rates for less expense than was figured on last winter.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. In a moment. The Committee on Naval Affairs went over these items very carefully with the idea of cutting down to the bone these various air stations of ours, that no money should be expended for permanent improvement that was not absolutely necessary, and this amendment, while it includes a large amount of money, is to carry forward and make necessary improvements at our various air stations. No one is more sincerely interested in economy than myself, but I honestly believe these improvements are essential. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York whether or not in the Navy they are still doing construction work under what is known as the cost-plus system?

Mr. HICKS. No; in the Navy we gave that system up three years ago; old contracts on ships commenced during the war are in some cases being completed under the cost-plus system.

Mr. McKENZIE. Are you letting contracts to competitive bidders for all construction work?

Mr. HICKS. Yes; in all cases; and where any changes are made in the contract after work has commenced we figure what the change will cost and then allow 10 per cent profit on that estimate.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If the gentleman will permit, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois I will say that so far as I know there are no cost-plus contracts except for the large ships which were entered into a long time ago, and those are being inspected with the greatest of care. This current construction work is not carried forward under that system now at all.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Why did the gentleman omit Cape May?

Mr. HICKS. Cape May was omitted because of the fact that it is hoped that the time may come when we can eliminate Cape May from our permanent stations, therefore in view of that possibility we did not deem it was wise to make an appropriation for that station. Now, these estimates cover several items which I can explain if desired; if not, I will yield the floor, after saying that those who believe in aviation, as I know many do, should pause before voting against this amendment, no matter how earnest they feel about economy. Aviation is in its infancy; no one can predict its future or prophesy its development. It is an essential arm of the service now and should be encouraged, not hampered; advanced, not retarded. Those tests a few days ago prove its value as a bombing factor which may materially alter our views about naval strategy. It is poor economy, my colleagues, to provide aircraft and then refuse facilities for the housing of that equipment and the training of men to operate it. So let us be reasonable and give to aviation what it needs.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I am keenly disappointed because very considerable additions have been made to this bill. I had hoped that we would have at least one appropriation measure that would go to the President for his signature in substantially the form in which it passed the House. The addition of $6,370,000 agreed upon by the conference committee and approximately $5,000,000 more under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York are not very considerable when the computation is made on the basis of a percentage of the $98,000,000 placed upon the bill by the Senate, but there is an outcry in this country for economy. Influential journals and prominent individuals that have been demanding a very large Navy for years have become converted to the idea that we must retrench in this branch of the public service. It seems to me the action we are taking is hardly fair to the Army. We treated propositions of the War Department with severity, we rejected them ruthlessly and made a reduction from 220,000 to 150,000 men, to be accomplished by the 1st of October.

The pinch of hard times is upon the people, and no department of the Government can ignore that fact. For these reasons I am opposed to this amendment.

But there is a larger question involved here upon which I wish to address the House. Are we not in a transition stage as regards equipment for war? The whole history of warfare shows a progressive change, much slower in the centuries that are past but very rapid now. In the olden time there was the club, the pike, the spear, the bow and arrow, and the battle-ax. Those gave way when explosives were invented. In the last few decades there has been a very swift development in the use of explosives and heavier ordnance. In recent years dynamite was chosen as an implement of destruction and was thought to be the last invention, but after that we have had the T. N. T. Now there are others under consideration infinitely more destructive even than the T. N. T., and the question arises, Will not the battles of the future be fought in the air? Trials are being made now. It was said when the ironclads were proposed as a substitute for the wooden ships that they would not be effective. Even our own Navy Department in the early sixties opposed the building of the monitors and the ironclads. A former Member of this House, Mr. Sperry, of Connecticut, was one of the guarantors of Mr. Ericsson in the building of the Monitor.

But there has been a revolution in naval warfare. In the olden day the wooden ship afforded a theater for heroism in battles unsurpassed in any conflicts on land or sea. The great naval achievements of England from the time of Drake and Frobisher down to the middle of the last century and later are an important part of the history of the world. Our own Navy from the time of the Revolutionary War has shown its splendid prowess with wooden ships. But on the 8th and 9th of March in 1862 a revolution occurred, and the nations realized the necessity of building ironclads. The ram Merrimac came out from Norfolk on March 8, 1862, and destroyed the Cumberland and Congress and beached the Minnesota—all wooden ships—and returned to her lair. That night there was more serious apprehension at Washington than on any day or night of the Civil War. There was a consultation of the Cabinet. Secretary Stanton, so bold and aggressive, was the most frightened of anyone and feared that a single boat, the Merrimac, would change the whole course of the contest. But the Monitor, diminutive in size, nicknamed "the Yankee cheese box on a raft," this new development in warfare, stood up against the Merrimac, drove her back, and she never appeared again upon the seas. Since then there has been a rapid development of the armored ship, the dreadnaught, and after that of the superdreadnaught. Now boats of the so-called Hood type are proposed. And so in the progress of time science devises new implements.

Now, I think we should seriously consider whether aircraft are not destined to make the proudest battleship on the sea a useless hulk, full of danger rather than a mighty implement of war. It may be said I am inconsistent if I oppose this amendment, but there are doubts also in regard to the use of aircraft. There is a heavier-than-air; there is the lighter-than-air. As I am informed, England is abandoning the use of the lighter-than-air as a craft for warlike uses. There is another question—namely, shall they be built of wood or of metal, aluminum, or some other material? Is this amount needed? There was a very considerable appropriation, $6,913,000, for aircraft in this bill as it left the House. Nineteen million dollars, as I understand, are carried in the Army bill, and a smaller amount of $1,500,000, or more, in the Post Office bill. What is especially needed now is experimentation, trial, to determine which are the best airships. The House has already decided on a considerable appropriation for additional construction. Ought we not to feel our way carefully, and especially ought we not to reject propositions that look to scattering all over the country our aircraft stations as is really contemplated by this amendment? Have we not enough to make a thorough trial of this question?

And there is one other point, Mr. Speaker, on which I wish to dwell. If there ever was a time for faith by nations or individuals, it is now, when the world is so oppressed by the enormous burden of armament. [Applause.] Can we not cherish the belief, the conviction, that other nations will join with us in stopping this competition, return to common sense, and travel along the path for peace? For this further reason I am opposed to this amendment. I really believe, I may say to the conferees on the part of the House, if at this time they had brought in the bill, it would not have passed the House with as large appropriations as were carried in it. Now, shall we add $6,000,000 for this, $5,000,000 for this, and a million and more for that? Gentlemen of the House, it is, in my judgment, time to pause, and to see if the forces of peace will not have the effect desired, and if by diplomatic negotiations or conference we can not establish a new order, in which these enormous navies and this enormous expense for aircraft will not be necessary. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who has just spoken, intimated that his argument might be somewhat inconsistent. I should say, with all due respect, that it is inconsistent. Many of you, I hope, have read in one of the recent magazines a very able article on a three-plane Navy; that is, on the water, in the air, and under water. The gentleman spoke about the changes of warfare on the seas, the change from wooden ships to armored ships. Now, in this late war have come the engines of war for the air and the engines of war for undersea. We all know that the experiments and expenditures and experience of Germany with aircraft, and especially with the submarines, almost won for her this late war.

Now, further along in the bill I regret to see that the conferees have stricken out an item which permitted the Navy Department to use a part of the $90,000,000 for new construction in the building of submarines. That did not involve any increased appropriation at all, but merely permitted them to proceed with experimental work or with construction, as they liked, on submarines. It would seem that if the argument of the gentleman from Ohio proved anything, it proved that in these services, where changes are rapid, experiment and invention should be encouraged and not stopped.

We all know that in the matter of submarines this country was lamentably behind. If you gentlemen will take the trouble to read the testimony that was taken by the Committee on Naval Affairs in the last Congress you will find there the testimony of Admiral Sims, to the effect that our submarines were not by any means as good as the German submarines. You will find that he gives some reasons for that. One reason is that the submarines have been designed here, many of them, by officers who are not in favor of that branch of the service. You will find further along in his testimony, in a colloquy with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], that he thinks that the whole matter of construction of submarines should be investigated, to find out why our submarines were not as good as the German submarines, and to find out who were responsible for that fact. He will tell you that the reason why the Central Powers so excelled in the matter of submarines was that their very life depended on these submarines.

Now, I think it does not take a great expert to say that the very life of the defense of this country in the next war from a naval attack will depend upon aircraft and submarines. So I say it would be a mistake at this time to discontinue the appropriations and discontinue the work on airplanes and submarines, which are by no means finally developed, which are still in an experimental state, and which it is certain are much less expensive as a means of defense than capital ships.

I am not competent to decide as a layman whether or not these capital ships are essential, but it is certain that without adequate submarines and without adequate aircraft we shall have no efficient Navy, and I hope, therefore, that the Committee on Naval Affairs will continue in the work which it has initiated in examining into these two services and bring in legislation providing for continued construction and continued experimentation, because I believe that such action will be not only for the best protection of this country, but also will be in the end most economical. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, it is an almost futile proposition to attempt to economize in the House of Representatives or in the Senate or in the Congress, but I deem it my duty to raise a protest to the continued extravagant expenditure of public money. I do not know how your people feel about it; I do not know how the newspapers that are the mouthpieces of your communities feel about it, but I know that the newspapers published throughout my district are weekly saying in every issue that the people of this country are getting tired of the fact that 90 per cent of the taxes raised by this Government are expended for the Army, Navy, and armament. [Applause.] And, although we can not get anywhere with it, I am going again to raise my voice in humble protest.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield in just one minute. I know how the gentleman from Delaware feels about it. He is circumscribed by a party machine influence that whips him into line every time a vote is taken, and instead of voting "no," as he feels deep down in his heart, he votes "yes" every time.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield.

Mr. LAYTON. But you have got no right to make any statement of that kind.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. In the Army bill we have already provided $19,000,000 for the Air Service. In the Post Office appropriation bill we have already provided $2,000,000 more, and in this bill, the naval bill, we are providing, or will when we get through with it, $13,000,000 more for the Air Service—all under three different heads and departments. And yet you have been preaching about concentrating, you have been preaching about preventing duplication, and every time there is given to you an opportunity to vote to stop it you continue to vote "yea" instead of "nay."

Now I will yield to my friend from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. I simply want to correct what you have put in the RECORD. You have put something in there that is not exactly or literally true.

Mr. BLANTON. I will take that out, and say that the party machine, led by the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and aided and abetted by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], is not altogether able to control the gentleman from Delaware, because when he votes "yea" when he should vote "nay," he does it on his own volition. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAYTON. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. When is the time coming to begin this practice of economy about which we hear so much? The other day when the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. A. P. NELSON] was on the floor, preaching economy so eloquently——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. May I have two minutes more?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAYTON. I shall not object if the gentleman will answer a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me finish this sentence. When the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin was preaching disarmament so eloquently and I asked him why he did not vote as he preached, he said he did do it. Then I brought in the RECORD here for February 14, 1921, where I made a motion to recommit the naval bill and cut out $83,000,000 that was going to be wasted on new ship construction, and I showed him where he had voted against that saving of $83,000,000, and where there were only nine men in this House who voted for this saving, one of those nine, let me say to my distinguished colleagues on my side of the House, being the distinguished ex-leader of the minority, Hon. Champ Clark of Missouri; and yet you would not follow him.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. BLANTON. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. LAYTON. It is estimated that the total expenditures of the Government will be about $4,000,000,000, is it not?

Mr. BLANTON. Much more than that.

Mr. LAYTON. For the expenses of the Government generally?

Mr. BLANTON. About five and one-half billion, according to our distinguished friend from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], who does not make any mistakes.

Mr. LAYTON. Well, I will let even that go. Now, how much is the total for the Army and the Navy as carried in the appropriations that we are making in this Congress?

Mr. BLANTON. I will let the distinguished chairman of the committee answer my friend from Delaware, and he has admitted on the floor that of the expenditures out of the Public Treasury at least 90 per cent go to the Army and Navy, pensions, and war purposes.

Mr. LAYTON. No; he never made any such statement.

Mr. BLANTON. He is here. Let him deny it.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, the total amount for the Army and Navy does not exceed $1,000,000,000. Therefore, by the figures which the gentleman from Texas has admitted, those expenditures are only 25 per cent of the total, instead of 90 per cent.

Mr. BLANTON. For the Army, Navy, pensions, and war purposes, and results of wars it is 90 per cent. According to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who runs the steering committee, the expenses of the Government have been decreased to such a great extent that we are not now taking much money out of the Treasury at all, but we are seemingly living on velvet—velvet! We are not expending anything at all, according to him. But the money is coming out of the Treasury all the time and the people are paying the taxes. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, what I desire to say is in opposition to the policy expressed in this bill—a policy of navalism which I have consistently opposed and which I expect to continue to oppose so long as I may be a Member of this House.

For the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1921, this session of Congress has appropriated $328,000,000 for the Army, and we are now appropriating $414,000,000 for the Navy, making a total of $742,000,000 for the support of the Army and Navy for the year. Such is the answer given by this Congress to the plea for economy made by the tax-burdened people.

We have provided for an Army of 150,000 and enough officers—17,000—to command an army of three times that number, compared with our 1916 Army of 90,000, with 3,000 officers. We are appropriating nearly $100,000,000 for next year's installment on our naval construction program, which is intended to give us the greatest Navy in the world in 1925. Our present naval strength is 127,000 sailors and marines, as against 66,000 in 1916. Our Navy's vessels are now more than twice the number of 1916, and its fighting efficiency five times as great. Such is the answer given by this Congress to those who plead for disarmament, who plead not merely upon grounds of economy but who realize that a great Army and Navy is a menace to the peace of the world.

RAISING A SMOKE SCREEN.

The great majority of the people believe that we should disarm and return substantially to our prewar forces. The people favor disarmament, and the politicians know it; so they feel the necessity to disguise their votes for big armies and navies by passing a resolution authorizing the President to call a conference on disarmament. It is the smoke screen which they are raising. It is the sop cast to public sentiment. They seek an excuse before the bar of public opinion. Such is the moving force behind the Borah amendment. It is a mere sham, a wretched piece of hypocrisy, a gesture for peace going along with votes for soldiers and ships.

The Borah amendment is a weak and watery thing. Adopted as a rider on the Navy bill, it authorizes and requests the President to invite Great Britain and Japan to confer upon the reduction of naval expenditures and building programs. The President is not required, but merely "requested and authorized" to act. All the nations are not to be invited, merely Great Britain and Japan. The conference is not to consider reduction of armies but merely the reduction of "naval expenditures and building programs." No navy is to be reduced. Not a single ship is to be put out of commission. The reduction relates merely to proposed increases. Such is the excuse to be offered to justify political stupidity and cowardice.

WE HAVE NO NEED TO COMPETE WITH GREAT BRITAIN AND JAPAN.

We are to confer with Great Britain and Japan concerning the reduction of navy building programs. Why with these Governments and not with others? The implication is clear that we are in naval competition with Great Britain and Japan; if they maintain vast navies, we must do likewise; if they go ahead with increases, we must increase; if they persist in the folly and wickedness of vast armaments, we must keep them company.

I deny that we are bound to compete in naval strength with Great Britain and Japan. Why must we compete with them? Is our situation identical? Have we the same aims? Is America committed to a policy of world expansion and exploitation? Do we aspire to far-flung provinces, to the subjugation of weak peoples, to a future of Prussianism and of might? I say no.

Again, our needs and perils are not the same as those of Great Britain and Japan. Our situation is not so precarious. We have no such need as they for armies and navies. Our aims, our ideals, our hopes, and our aspirations are totally different. America is not an empire, it is not a new Rome grasping for the hegemony of the world.

The British are an island nation with a homeland densely populated and dependent on sea and ships for a supply of the instant necessaries of life. Cut off from the outside world, millions of her people would die of starvation in a few weeks. Great Britain is an imperial empire. Her policy has brought her possessions in every corner of the world. Her colonies are planted in every longitude. Her bankers and traders have their investments in every clime. Every continent finds its choice spaces under her control. Great Britain is bound to keep open her lines of communication—to destroy them would mean the disruption of the Empire.

Japan is also an island Empire. Her homeland is also nonselfsupporting. She, too, must depend upon ships for sustenance. Japan, too, has her policy of expansion, her colonial system, and her aims for the dominion of the Orient. She requires a vast fleet to carry out her aspirations for the future.

But the United States is self-supporting. We need not starve nor shiver if an enemy should capture the sea. We may live at home and eat and wear our own produce. We can exist indefinitely with all lines of communication severed. Our situation is not that of Great Britain and Japan. Their perils are not ours. There is no need that we should be guided by their example in maintaining armed forces. We are not in competition with them in the things they are trying to do nor in meeting the needs which confront them.

COMPETITION IN WORLD POLICY MEANS WAR.

Of course, if we are going to compete with Great Britain and Japan in matters of foreign policy—in the things which do not concern our domestic affairs—then we must compete with them in armaments. Indeed, in such case we would be compelled to outdistance them in such competition. Competition in foreign policy with Great Britain and Japan—in expansion, in exploitation, in imperialism—will inevitably bring us into conflict with those nations. Sooner or later such course will bring war with them.

If it is to be the policy of America to seize upon the territory of weak and undeveloped peoples and to spread our possessions over the face of the world, to hold the South, the East, and the islands of the sea in the hollow of our hands, then there will be a clash; there will be a robbers' quarrel over loot; there will be war. If we are to enter upon a foreign policy of expansion, of imperialism, of exploitation, if we are to provide for our financiers and traders a safe market for their money and goods, we must have an Army and a Navy to defend their enterprises and to collect their debts. If we, like Japan, intend to seize a section of China, to grind its people, to rob its mines, to make ourselves great at its expense—if we, like Great Britain has done with Africa, intend to mark off an undeveloped continent and hold it for our own to feast and fatten on, and for a field for our commercial enterprises—then we must have armies and navies not only equal to but excelling theirs, for we must be able to defend our spoils and to keep off other buccaneers.

AMERICA, EXEMPLAR OF JUSTICE, LIBERTY, AND BROTHERHOOD.

But I deny that America is to depart from her traditions. I deny that we are to cease to be a great democracy and become a military empire for the benefit of the dollar-grabbing classes. Perhaps there are those who would like to see our country a new Rome, sitting in marble majesty and drawing the best fruits of men's toil from every corner of the world; a new Rome, with an opulent patrician class with a servile and ragged multitude feeding at their gates; a new Rome, with gilded Fifth Avenues thronged with profligates and spendthrifts within a stone's throw of the squalor, disease, and poverty of East Side slums. But I am not one of these. I have no such vicious dream. I hope for my country that it may go forward to its high destiny as a great democracy, an exemplar of liberty, justice, and brotherhood. I hope that throughout the coming centuries it may be a land of opportunity for common men; a land of justice and generosity toward foreign peoples, great and small; a land of economic and political equality and of hope and liberty for every citizen.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York for the increase for purposes of new construction in connection with the airplane bases is not as objectionable as some of the other items of increase in the Senate bill, but I do not believe it should be agreed to. [Applause.] I do not think it is necessary to agree to it for the good of the Navy. I am quite sure it is not wise to agree to it for the good of the legislative committees of the House and of the Treasury. It is true that in the last Congress the Naval Committee did consider these items of increased expenditure and did approve them, but the House never considered them, and in this Congress the Naval Committee has not presented them to the House, although the committee has had abundant time in which to do so.

Had the Naval Committee of the House earlier in the session reported these items, they would have secured the consideration of such a bill. But no such bill has been presented, and the House has not been asked to pass on the matter. Until the House has been in a formal and regular way asked to approve these items of increase, it should not be asked to accept them on an appropriation bill. The committee may still report a bill carrying these items if it approves them. I assure the committee that as far as I have any influence in the matter the House will have an early opportunity to consider such a bill. If the bill is considered favorably by the House, the matter can be taken care of promptly, and there need be no delay that will be harmful to the service. The matter should be cared for in an orderly way through the legislative committee, and not in this irregular way on an appropriation bill.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I think there is some misapprehension concerning the pending motion as to whether it promotes an increase or a decrease. Our distinguished leader has suggested that it was an increase, and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] said it was an increase. It is a decrease of about $150,000 from the amount desired in the Senate amendment. My impression is that the motion of the gentleman from New York carries $1,177,000.

Mr. MONDELL. It is $1,000,000 more than the House provided.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am talking about the bill as amended and not as it left the House. The bill that we have before us carries a Senate amendment for $1,339,000, and the gentleman's amendment reduces it $150,000. Let us see what the amendment desires. Bear in mind that the naval experts have come before our committee time and again on items like this, and on these very items, and have told us solemnly and sincerely that without the control of the air our Navy is useless. With the long-range guns firing accurately 14 to 18 miles, at a distance which can not be seen except through aviation assistance, the big guns would be useless without control of the air.

This amendment provides for new construction at Coco Solo on the Panama Canal, which is the important link in the military strategy of our country. It means new construction at Pearl Harbor. Pearl Harbor may some day be our Heligoland of the Pacific. It means new construction at San Diego, the most important aviation base on the Pacific. It contemplates new construction at Hampton Roads, on the Atlantic coast, the base of our Navy. Surely these are important and very strategic locations.

Now, an amount of $1,175,000 is not important when you realize that aviation is going ahead by leaps and bounds and that without aviation or the control of the air we might as well kiss our battleships good-by.

Mr. Speaker, the following tabulation will give some idea of the contemplated improvement:

"COCO SOLO.

"CONTINUATION OF SANITARY FILL, $56,000.

"The Naval Air Station, Coco Solo, is built on filled ground, and it is desired to extend the area filled to provide for an enlargement of the station and to reduce the danger from malaria on account of the insanitary condition of the swamp.

"HANGAR FOR FIVE F5'S, $120,000.

"Three small hangars are available at the station, none of them large enough to hold the large type of F5L machine now operating there. The original hangars were built to house a smaller type of plane developed early in the war. The F5's are now being moored outdoors, and for the proper protection of the planes and equipment it is desired to construct one large steel hangar 150 feet wide by 200 feet long.

"COMPLETION OF WATER SUPPLY (200,000-GALLON TANK), $30,000.

"It is desired to construct a 200,000-gallon elevated water supply tank in order to have sufficient reserve supply for the station in case of breakdown of the pipe line. Water is sent to the station through an 8-inch pipe line about 7 or 8 miles long, and in case of breakage of line the station has no reserve supply at all for fire protection or domestic uses.

"AEROLOGICAL LABORATORY, $4,000.

"In order to safeguard the operation of aircraft, it is necessary to have complete meteorological records, and it is desired to construct a small laboratory to house the necessary instruments.

"PEARL HARBOR.

"KITE-BALLOON HANGAR, $20,000.

"The present plans for Pearl Harbor do not include a kite-balloon hangar. It is desired to construct one in order to house kite balloons on shore and to permit of experimental work on land and observations from ships.

"EXTENSION TO BARRACKS AND MESS HALL FOR 200 MEN, $100,000.

"The present plans for Pearl Harbor include barracks capacity for 400 men. It is desired to extend the facilities to enable 200 additional men to be housed. This will not entirely meet the requirements, as, on account of the large number of planes that will be sent there, it will be necessary to assign 1,000 or 1,200 enlisted men, and the balance will have to be housed in tents.

"EXTENSION TO BACHELOR OFFICERS' QUARTERS FOR 20 OFFICERS, $40,000.

"The present plan includes a building to house 40 officers. As at least 100 officers will be assigned to the station when it is in full operation, it is desired to increase the facilities for bachelor officers.

"DISPENSARY, $40,000.

"Bureau of Engineering Equipment, $10,000.

"SAN DIEGO.

"CARPENTER SHOP, $100,000.

"During the war a small carpenter shop 60 by 100 feet was built at San Diego for repairs to the small training planes then in use. On account of the increased number of planes, the larger sized planes, and the basing of the Pacific Fleet Air Detachment at San Diego, it is necessary to provide increased carpenter-shop facilities, and it is proposed to construct a building 100 by 220 feet, if this item is approved.

"GASOLINE STORAGE AND DISTRIBUTING SYSTEM, $23,000.

"At present there are three 5,000-gallon gasoline tanks at San Diego. On account of the large increased number of planes operating, it is desired to install additional storage for 60,000 gallons, and to provide a distributing system to feed the gasoline to the different operating points on the beach.

"BUREAU OF ENGINEERING EQUIPMENT, $41,000.

"On account of the construction this year of a machine shop at San Diego, it is necessary for the Bureau of Engineering to purchase additional equipment, and this item is desired in order to enable them to place the machine shop in full operation.

"BULKHEAD, FILL, AND GRADING, $70,000.

"The strengthening of the bulkhead around the east and west aviation piers has never been completed, and it is necessary to repair several hundred linear feet of the bulkhead and to place additional fill and do a certain amount of grading around the buildings and on the landing field.

"BUREAU OF ENGINEERING EQUIPMENT, $8,000.

"This item is requested for Bureau of Engineering shop equipment."

Mr. Speaker, the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] should prevail.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some misapprehension with reference to this amendment. From the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], for whom I have the greatest respect, he gave the impression to the House that these are new stations. He is in error, for these are old stations, and in the betterment of aviation the increased size of the planes alone means that we must increase the size of the hangars; as the science of air advances we must advance in utilizing it or it will be of no avail. When last fall a naval commission went to San Diego we saw plane after plane crowded into hangars when only a part of a plane could get under the roof. We saw the same condition in Panama. Why was that? Because of the increased size of the planes which had been increased since the hangars were built. Now they want to increase the size of the hangars so that they can house the planes properly and keep them out of the weather. Over one-fourth of the amount asked for in my amendment is to be used at Coco Solo, Panama, and you will remember that the President, when he was there, expressed his views that Panama was one place where we must use every effort to defend our property and our rights, in case of trouble. The Panama Canal, my friends, is a most valuable connecting link between the Atlantic and Pacific. Four hundred thousand dollars of this appropriation will be expended in making that station efficient and available for proper defense of the canal. The other amounts are for Lakehurst and for Hampton Roads, Pensacola, and Pearl Harbor. These are military necessities to make aviation an efficient arm of the service, which we all believe it to be. Without this amendment you will weaken the Navy just so much. This is a small percentage of your $400,000,000. In order to round out the Navy and make it efficient you must adopt this amendment.

It is my hope and belief that aviation will increase on the sea and decrease on the land, so far as the Navy is concerned, but we must have places to train our men; we must have facilities upon which to base our patrol of the sea; we must have stations to carry on experimental work. The Navy is depending more and more upon aviation. It is the eye of the fleet, the medium which makes effective the long-range gun. As the Navy is the first line of defense, so aviation will be the first line of defense of the fleet itself. [Applause].

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the nation that at this time develops the highest efficiency in its air service will take the longest strides toward the permanent peace of the world and toward reducing the expenses of national defense. [Applause.] That nation that has the most efficient air service will be the last nation that will be attacked by a belligerent power. If it has not already been demonstrated that gas, T. N. T., and other explosives can be used from the air against a foe with greater efficiency, with greater destruction, than any other agency of defense that a nation can have, it will be demonstrated within the next 20 days. Within the last few days I have seen airplanes carrying six T. N. T. bombs, each weighing 100 pounds, circling in the air at an elevation of 2,000 to 2,500 feet, 45 miles at sea, searching for an enemy. They found the enemy in a target. From that elevation and from the plane in which I sat one of these 100-pound T. N. T. bombs was dropped, according to a mathematically figured system, and it struck a target about the size of a destroyer in the center the first shot. That bomb would have destroyed any boat of that size afloat to-day. It is just as easy to carry a 2,000-pound bomb as a 100-pound bomb, and just as easy to discharge it with accuracy. The 2,000-pound bomb can be carried on a plane that cost $40,000, which is manned with three men, and the bomb will cost about $2,000. That bomb of T. N. T. will destroy a battleship that costs $40,000,000, manned with 1,200 men, 125 officers, and will leave absolutely nothing to tell the story. So I say that the nation which develops this new agency will have the greatest engine of national defense that there has been developed in the world, and will do more toward establishing the peace of the world and reducing the expense of armament than any nation can do otherwise. Therefore I shall vote for this amendment. I shall vote for the development of the Air Service. I shall do everything I can to develop that great agency, so that it will be the terror of any nation that would declare war against us. No ministry will hereafter declare war against a nation that has a well-developed air service. No European or Asiatic Government will declare war against any nation that has a well-developed air service. That nation will be in the safest position among the nations of the world that has an air service that can meet all comers in the air.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. Is the gentleman not aware that already by amendment we have added more than $5,000,000 for the construction of aircraft?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. STAFFORD). The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question. The facts are that I am averse to adding any expenditure at all unless it is absolutely essential. I want to know whether we have any fund that is appreciable that can be applied to aircraft or aeronautic improvement?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Besides what is appropriated?

Mr. FESS. Besides what is proposed here.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think not.

Mr. FESS. Then, Mr. Speaker, it is easily within the purview of possibility, I think, that the time will come when the Air Service will be so far improved that it will not be obstructed by the presence of seas and oceans. We must not overlook the possibility that a future enemy may come from any country notwithstanding distance or barrier. If thus prepared and we not prepared, it would not be difficult to predict results. It strikes me that not to move toward the development of this new service, so wonderfully demonstrated in the last few days, would be unwise. It may be the cheapest as well as the most effective defense, which, from recent demonstrations, has at least raised the question of its importance. I have been one of the men who have insisted that we must find a place to cut these appropriations. I still so insist wherever it can be done. But I feel impelled, under the possibility of aircraft development for defense, to vote for a reasonable appropriation for increase of this service. If the predictions of air experts have any basis in fact, and all will agree that the recent demonstrations just referred to compel some credence in those predictions, future consideration must be given to the wisdom of abandoning the construction of the dreadnaughts, so frightfully expensive. It may be that small appropriations for the Air Service may prove to be our greatest step toward economy in naval defense, especially so if the new development can do away with the heavy armaments. In that belief, I will vote for this item.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division of the question. The motion is to recede and concur with an amendment.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on all motions pending before the House.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas demands a division of the question. The question first comes on the motion to recede.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 90, noes 50.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and I object to the vote because there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-two Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. A vote against receding would be in favor of the larger sum, would it not?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that after the Chair has declared there is no quorum present, everything is out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order and will entertain the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire whether a vote against the motion to recede would not be equivalent to a vote for the Senate amendment, or the larger sum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the motion to recede is rejected, it is tantamount to insisting upon the disagreement, because then the motion that would be in order would be either a motion to insist or to adhere. The Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to recede.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 221, nays 95, answered "present" 2, not voting 113, as follows:

So the motion to recede was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. MARTIN (for) with Mr. SUMNERS of Texas (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. TREADWAY with Mr. COLLIER.

Mr. PATTERSON of Missouri with Mr. HAWES.

Mr. CROWTHER with Mr. LEE of Georgia.

Mr. EDMONDS with Mr. THOMAS.

Mr. HAYS with Mr. McDUFFIE.

Mr. KAHN with Mr. PARK of Georgia.

Mr. KREIDER with Mr. HAYDEN.

Mr. WATSON with Mr. POU.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY, vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He did not.

Mr. COLLIER. I desire to vote "aye," but I am paired with him, and I therefore answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question now is on the other portion of the motion of the gentleman from New York to concur with an amendment.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 15: Page 6, line 7, strike out the figures "$6,913,431" and insert "$18,729,000, and the money herein specifically appropriated for 'aviation' shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing laws as 'aviation' and for that purpose shall constitute one fund: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, and pay out of this appropriation the amounts due on claims for damages which have occurred or may occur to private property growing out of the operations of naval aircraft, where such claim does not exceed the sum of $500: Provided further, That all claims adjusted under this authority during any fiscal year shall be reported in detail to the Congress by the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the amendment with the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the sum of "$18,729,000" proposed in said amendment No. 15 insert "$13,413,431," and in lieu of the sum of "$500" named in said amendment insert "$250."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan moves to recede and concur with the amendment which has just been reported at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business of Calendar Wednesday, in order to-morrow, be dispensed with, so that we may proceed with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with business in order on to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee and Mr. BRITTEN reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Illinois reserve the right to object. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is recognized.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I presume the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] has no hope of being able to conclude the consideration of the conference report to-day?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I thought inasmuch as this is a pretty warm day we had best adjourn at 5 o'clock to-night.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think there is no objection on this side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman couple with his request the suggestion that Calendar Wednesday be carried over to Thursday in order that certain bills on the calendar might be then considered?

Mr. MADDEN. I doubt the wisdom of that, because there are some very important matters that ought to come up, and I do not believe we ought to do it.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have in mind certain important matters that are pending and might be considered on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Michigan a question? Can the gentleman inform the House whether or not he expects to finish this report to-morrow?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think so; to-morrow night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk simply corrects the total in harmony with the action of the House, reducing the amount which the Secretary of the Navy can settle claims from $500 to $250.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that amendment No. 16 be passed, as it is contingent on what the House does with amendments Nos. 51 and 54.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to pass consideration of Senate amendment No. 16. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 18: Page 7, line 18, after the figures "$106,250," insert: ": Provided, That the word 'and,' before Corpus Christi, in line 11 of section 1 of the act entitled 'An act for the establishment of marine schools, and for other purposes,' approved March 4, 1911, be stricken out, and following the words 'Corpus Christi,' in the same line, insert the words 'Tampa, Fla., and Portland, Me.'"

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement. I will say with respect to this amendment that it authorizes two more naval schools, to be maintained by the States of Maine and Florida, toward which the Federal Government will contribute $25,000 a year, provided those States spend that sum. There are already some 8 or 10 schools of this kind authorized by law, and 3 or 4 are in existence. This authorizes repayment to these two extra States. Of course, it is a matter of legislation and comes under the jurisdiction of the Naval Committee. That is why I make the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. We never considered this, as has been suggested.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. It amends the act heretofore passed. That act provided that Congress may reimburse States for amounts expended by them not exceeding $25,000.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. This adds two States.

Mr. PADGETT. And the States must expend the money in these schools before the reimbursement takes place.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; that is right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to take up the time of this House in discussing this amendment. I make a preferential motion that the House recede and concur in this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine offers a preferential motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BEEDY moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Maine.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 19: Page 8, line 10, after the word "men," insert the words "and applicants for enlistment."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 19.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that this was one of the items that was stricken out by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] on a point of order.

Mr. BRITTEN rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. BRITTEN. I rise to move that the House recede and concur on the Senate amendment. The language has been carried on the appropriation bills heretofore for many years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BRITTEN moves that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, this item was carried in the appropriation bill for many years. It was stricken out by a point of order made by myself. It is really necessary legislation.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. How much will this cost?

Mr. BRITTEN. Nothing. I say that it is merely legislation, taken out of the bill on a point of order made by me.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Illinois saw fit to knock it out some time ago. Now he is trying to put it in again.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no interest in this legislation, but it is necessary. It was stricken out on a point of order made by me, not because I had any opposition to the legislation itself, but because of the rule under which we were operating.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 20: Page 8, line 11, after the word "route," insert the words "or cash in lieu thereof."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 20.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a preferential motion, that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. Speaker, this language was taken out of the bill on a point of order made by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BRITTEN moves that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 20.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, to recede and concur.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 21: Page 9, after line 4, insert: "The Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, is hereby directed to furnish to the proper officers in the several States, Territories, insular possessions, and the District of Columbia, on or before December 31, 1921, statements of the services of all persons from those several places who served in the Navy during the war with Germany, and for that purpose an additional sum not to exceed $100,000 is hereby appropriated for obtaining the necessary material and the employment of the necessary clerical force."

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 21.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman remember that we made a compact with the Navy Department to make these records for something over $200,000? Does the gentleman remember when he sat with us in the committee room they asked $700,000, and we declined to make the appropriation, and these officials appeared and agreed with us to make these records for a little over $200,000 or $250,000? I hope the gentleman will be firm and insist that we shall not increase the amount.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am entirely willing that the House shall do with the item whatever it sees fit; but I think I ought to state just what the situation is.

This appropriation is to pay for compiling the records of the men who served in the Navy during the war. These records are to be made for the several States. The work is about three-quarters finished, and if it is not finished the States will not have a complete record of those who served in the war. It is estimated that it will be done by the 1st of October. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] that they thought it could be finished for a smaller sum and that it could be finished by the 1st of July; but the 1st of July is practically here now and these records are not yet finished, and it will take about $50,000 more to do it. While I have made the motion that the House further insist upon its disagreement, I thought the Members ought to know that if my motion should prevail these records would not be finished and the work already done would be only partial and, I fear, useless. I agree entirely with Mr. BUTLER, but I see no other course open if the records are to be made available. Of course, this is a provision of legislation and if not taken care of here will have to be met by the Naval Committee later, as I feel quite sure that the House will desire to have these records complete and will make this appropriation either now or at some future time.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a preferential motion, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BRITTEN moves, in lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, to insert the following:

"The Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, is hereby directed to furnish to the proper officers in the several States, Territories, insular possessions, and the District of Columbia, on or before October 31, 1921, statements of the services of all persons from those several places who served in the Navy during the war with Germany, and for that purpose exclusively an additional sum not to exceed $50,000 is hereby appropriated for obtaining the necessary material and the employment of the necessary clerical force."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman's motion is to recede and concur with the amendment as stated?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the motion will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, may I have three minutes?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, this amendment was prepared by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations. I think it meets with the approval of the members of that committee. It shortens the time in which these service records for use of the several States are to be made by the department, making the time October 31, 1921, instead of December 31. It also reduces the amount 50 per cent, or, in other words, from $100,000 to $50,000. Now, as indicated by the distinguished gentleman having the bill in charge [Mr. KELLEY of Michigan], unless this appropriation is made these records will not be finished by the department. The service records of the men who took part in the late World War in the Navy will not be compiled, and will not be at the disposal of your State and mine. Sooner or later you will bring in a deficiency appropriation to care for this work, because it ought to be done and it will be done. I hope the House will adopt my motion. It is in the interest of economy to finish this compilation now with an experienced personnel.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know what the Bureau of Navigation say they need for this purpose?

Mr. BRITTEN. I think they have indicated that they can get along with $50,000 to complete the work.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know why the Senate inserted $100,000?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I have not the slightest idea.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STEPHENS. How much have they expended already?

Mr. BRITTEN. Two hundred thousand dollars, I believe.

Mr. STEPHENS. This will make $250,000?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman has made a preferential motion. Did the gentleman learn why the Bureau of Navigation did not keep its compact with us?

Mr. BRITTEN. I can only reply to my good friend that the Bureau of Navigation made a mistake in its estimate of the cost of this work. It is a laborious job.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that.

Mr. BRITTEN. It is almost completed, and the gentleman knows its value to the country as a matter of future reference. Every man who served is entitled to this slight consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend will recall the fact that they demanded $700,000 to do the work that they propose to do now for $250,000.

Mr. BRITTEN. We gave them but $200,000, and that is the reason they had to call upon us again.

Mr. BUTLER. Two hundred thousand is enough; there is no use to make a contract with them unless they keep it. This is all wrong.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. I want to suggest that the gentleman's amendment contains a repetition of language.

Mr. BRITTEN. It is a repetition in language only in so far as that repetition is really necessary.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman's amendment uses the words "$50,000 is hereby appropriated," when the first part of the act says "the following sums are hereby appropriated." That might render the appropriation ineffective under a strict construction.

Mr. BRITTEN. It was prepared by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations. I hope the House will see fit to adopt my amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I have great regard for the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, but it is still a repetition.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

PEACE RESOLUTION.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the conference report on the peace resolution may be presented to the House any time before midnight to-night, to be printed under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. STAFFORD). The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the conference report on the peace resolution may be presented at any time before midnight and have it printed under the rule. Is there objection?

UMI

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman from Massachusetts consulted the minority conferees?

Mr. ROGERS. Not with specific reference to this request; but there was a meeting of all the conferees this afternoon, and I think it was the undoubted understanding that the conference report was to be submitted to-day in view of the fact that a full agreement had been reached.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts consulted the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD]?

Mr. ROGERS. I just answered the gentleman from Tennessee. I think the gentleman from Virginia understands that the conference report is to be presented to-day.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman from Virginia is informed of the contents of the report?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly; there was a full meeting of the conferees this afternoon.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There will be no effort to call up the report until after this conference report is concluded?

Mr. ROGERS. My understanding is that this conference report on the peace resolution will follow the conference report on the naval bill.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Did the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] sign the conference report?

Mr. ROGERS. Neither the gentleman from Virginia nor the Senate minority conferee signed the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

ELECTION TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 137.

Resolved, That Mr. LAMAR JEFFERS, of Alabama, be, and he is hereby, elected to the Committees on Flood Control, Reform in the Civil Service, and Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONFERENCE ON THE NAVAL BILL.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of great importance that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois be adopted. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has outlined the situation and has advised the Members of the House that the records of these soldiers who served in the late war in the Navy under the act of Congress are being compiled for the several States of the Union. That work is to-day approximately three-quarters completed. We have appropriated more money than it was at first thought would be necessary to do the work. The total amount appropriated is $300,000. If this work shall stop now it will mean that a force of something like 125 or 130 employees will have to give over the responsibility for the work to a new force, which will have to be assembled whenever Congress shall make the appropriation. I submit that it will take 50 or 100 per cent more money to pay a new group of people to finish this up than it will if we permit the old force to go ahead and finish up the work by the 1st of next October. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois ought to prevail.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recede and concur with an amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BUTLER) there were 58 ayes and 14 nays.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point there is no quorum present.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania withhold his point of no quorum?

Mr. BUTLER. For how long?

The SPEAKER. For a few minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I will, but I want to reserve all my rights.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Michigan withhold his motion to adjourn?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, the following leaves of absence were granted:

To Mr. SEARS, for an indefinite time, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. CRAMTON (at the request of Mr. MAPES), indefinitely, on account of death in family.

To Mr. A. P. NELSON, for a few days, on account of important business.

HAWAIIAN HOMES COMMISSION.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, on behalf of the Committee on Territories, that I may have until 12 o'clock to-night to file a report on Senate bill 1881, to establish an Hawaiian homes commission, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that he may have until 12 o'clock to-night to file a report on S. 1881. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Are any minority views to be filed, or is it a unanimous report?

Mr. CURRY. It is a unanimous report.

There was no objection.

INTERNATIONAL CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION, BRAZIL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, a report from the Secretary of State concerning the desirability of the Government of the United States participating in an international centennial exposition which is to open in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on September 7, 1922.

To the recommendations of this report I give my hearty approval. I trust the Congress will view the matter favorably and will make timely provisions to enable the United States suitably to participate in the exposition.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
June 27, 1921.

DEATH OF HON. CHARLES J. BONAPARTE.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my duty to announce the death at his home in Maryland, at 4.30 a. m. to-day, of the Hon. Charles J. Bonaparte, former Attorney General of the United States and former Secretary of the Navy. Mr. Bonaparte comes of the Patterson family and is the grandson of Betsy Patterson, one of our best Maryland families, which did so much for our State and Union, and was a descendant of the illustrious French family of that name, being the grandson of Jerome Bonaparte, King of Westphalia and grand nephew of the great Napoleon. As a mark of respect to this distinguished gentleman I move that the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 29, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.
